

5

PENGUIN READERS

SHERLOCK HOLMES SHORT STORIES

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE

PENGUIN READERS

Sherlock Holmes Short Stories

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

Sherlock Holmes
Short Stories

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE

Level 5

Selected and retold by Anthony Laude
Series Editors: Andy Hopkins and Jocelyn Potter

Pearson Education Limited
Edinburgh Gate, Harlow,
Essex CM20 2JE, England and Associated Companies throughout the world.

ISBN: 978-1-4058-6523-4

First published in the Longman Simplified English Series 1977
First published in the Longman Fiction Series 1993
This adaptation first published in 1996
First published by Penguin Books 1999
This edition published 2008

7 9 10 8

Original copyright © The Copyright holders of the Sir Arthur Conan Doyle-works, reproduced by kind permission of Jonathan Clowes Ltd London, on behalf of Andrea Plunket, Trustee & Administrator
Text copyright © Penguin Books Ltd 1999
This edition copyright © Pearson Education Ltd 2008

Typeset by Graphicraft Ltd, Hong Kong
Set in 11/14pt Bembo
Printed in China
SWTC/07

All rights reserved; no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior written permission of the Publishers.

Published by Pearson Education Ltd in association with Penguin Books Ltd, both companies being subsidiaries of Pearson Plc

For a complete list of the titles available in the Penguin Readers series please write to your local Pearson Longman office or to: Penguin Readers Marketing Department, Pearson Education, Edinburgh Gate, Harlow, Essex CM20 2JE, England.

Contents

	page
Introduction	v
The Man with the Twisted Lip	1
The Engineer's Thumb	20
The Patient	42
The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax	53
The Three Garridebs	71
Wisteria House	90
Activities	111

Introduction

He kept looking at the telegram. At last, after lunch, he read it out loud to me:

HAVE JUST HAD A STRANGE EXPERIENCE. MAY I CONSULT YOU? SCOTT ECCLES, POST OFFICE, CHARING CROSS.

'Is Scott Eccles a man or a woman?' I asked.

'Oh, a man, of course! No woman would ever send a telegram like that. A woman would have come straight to me.'

All sorts of people visit Sherlock Holmes, the great detective, but they all have one thing in common: when they arrive at his London address in Baker Street, they all need his help in solving problems that the police cannot help them with. There are few cases that Holmes cannot solve. Fortunately for us, his friend and colleague, Dr Watson, is always with him, taking notes. These are Dr Watson's stories.

Why has a woman's honest, faithful, hard-working husband suddenly gone missing somewhere among the dangerous opium houses of East London? Why has an engineer lost his thumb, and why can't he remember where it happened? Why is a quiet, harmless man suddenly filled with terror at the arrival of a mysterious Russian lord? Why does Holmes send Watson to Switzerland? Why does a bad-tempered American lawyer suddenly become friendly with an old bone-collector who lives alone? And why does a good-looking man from Spain invite a stranger to his house on the night before he dies? Holmes enjoys solving puzzles like these and, thanks to Watson's notes, we can follow each case step by step to its logical, and often unexpected, ending.

Before he became a writer, Conan Doyle studied medicine, and much of the character of Sherlock Holmes is taken from one of his teachers, Joseph Bell. When patients came to see him, Bell was often able to give them information about their jobs, habits and even their illnesses before they had said a word. He taught his students the importance of small details, which is one of the skills needed by all great detectives. Sherlock Holmes is more interested in the activities of the brain and the use of faultless logic than in the imperfections of often illogical human emotion. He shows no interest in women and his only friend is Dr Watson, which makes him seem at times more like a machine than a human being.

The reading public, however, were not interested in Holmes's less attractive qualities. After two Sherlock Holmes novels, A Study in Scarlet (1888) and The Sign of Four (1890), short stories about the detective began to appear regularly in the Strand magazine, and Holmes quickly became a national hero. The magazine sold more copies than it had ever done before. Much of the stories' success was due to Sidney Paget's wonderful drawings of the great detective, which show him in his famous hat and smoking his pipe – details which rarely appear in the stories themselves.

The short stories in this collection all originally appeared in the Strand magazine: 'The Man with the Twisted Lip' in December 1891; 'The Engineer's Thumb' in March 1892; 'The Patient' (original title, 'The Resident Patient') in August 1893; 'Wisteria House' (original title, 'Wisteria Lodge') in September and October 1908; 'The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax' in December 1911; and 'The Three Garridebs' in January 1925. As these stories were written over such a long period, we can see the relationship between Holmes and Watson changing over the years. In the early stories, which are not included in this collection, Holmes and Watson are single men sharing rooms at 221B Baker Street in London. Later, as in some of these stories, Watson is not living with Holmes because he has married and has his own medical practice near Paddington Station. When Watson's wife dies, he returns to Baker Street.

Despite the success of Sherlock Holmes, however, Conan Doyle dreamt of becoming a more 'serious' writer and of writing different types of books. After he had agreed to write a second series of stories for the Strand, therefore, he decided that his detective had to die. The last story in this second series, 'The Final Problem' (December 1893), ends with Holmes in Switzerland, fighting for his life with his greatest enemy, Moriarty. When Watson arrives, both men have disappeared. They have, it seems, both fallen to their deaths. The public were shocked and angry, unable to believe that their hero was dead. Conan Doyle himself was surprised by this reaction, but refused for several years to write another Sherlock Holmes story. In 1901, however, he changed his mind, and wrote The Hound of the Baskervilles. He was unwilling, however, to bring Sherlock Holmes back to life, so the story took place before Holmes's 'death' in Switzerland. When The Hound of the Baskervilles appeared in August 1901, the Strand magazine immediately sold 30,000 copies more than usual.

Two years after the great success of The Hound of the Baskervilles, Conan Doyle really did bring Sherlock Holmes back to life. In 1903, an American company offered him the enormous sum of 25,000 dollars for six stories, and he could not refuse. In the short story 'The Empty House', Holmes returns to Baker Street – to the great shock of Dr Watson! It seemed that only Moriarty had died in Switzerland. Holmes had spent the next two years travelling because other enemies had also wanted to kill him. This did not make much sense, but readers did not care. Their hero had returned, and nothing else mattered. After his third series of adventures, The Return of Sherlock Holmes (1904), there was one final novel, The Valley of Fear (1915) and two more collections of short stories, His Last Bow (1917) and The Casebook of Sherlock Holmes (1927).

In total, Conan Doyle wrote four Sherlock Holmes novels and fifty-six short stories. However, as we have already seen, he did not want to be remembered only as the creator of Sherlock Holmes. He wrote books of historical fiction, including The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard (1896) and The Adventures of Gerard (1896). He also wrote science fiction stories, the most famous of which is The Lost World (1912). His desire to escape the enormous success of Sherlock Holmes is perhaps understandable, but without Sherlock Holmes he would almost certainly not be remembered today.

Sherlock Holmes is the most famous detective in the world, and is probably the best-known fictional character in literature. There have been hundreds of films about his stories, and many actors have become famous for playing the part of Sherlock Holmes. Perhaps one of the best was Basil Rathbone, who made fourteen Sherlock Holmes films for Hollywood between 1939 and 1946.

Arthur Conan Doyle was one of ten children, born into an Irish family in Edinburgh in 1859. His father, Charles Doyle, was an artist, but he drank too much and life was hard for the Doyle family. Young Arthur was sent away to a Catholic school in the north of England, and rarely saw his father.

From 1876 to 1881, Conan Doyle studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh, then worked as a ship's doctor on a journey to the West African coast. In 1882, he started work as a doctor in Plymouth, but without much success. As his medical work did not keep him very busy, he amused himself by writing stories, the first of which was printed in Chambers's Edinburgh Journal before he was twenty.

After a move to Southsea, he began to write more. His first important work, A Study in Scarlet, appeared in Beeton's Christmas Annual in 1887, and introduced the reading public for the first time to Sherlock Holmes.

In 1885, Conan Doyle married Louisa Hawkins, who died in 1906. One year after his wife's death, he married Jean Leckie, whom he had met and fallen in love with in 1897. Conan Doyle had five children, two with his first wife and three with his second.

In 1891, he moved to London and, after a short time as an unsuccessful eye doctor, gave up all medical work to become a full-time writer. Apart from his Sherlock Holmes stories and other fiction, he wrote a book about the war between the British and Dutch in South Africa, The Great Boer War (1900), defending British action in South Africa at the time.

Conan Doyle tried twice, without success, to become a member of the British parliament. He became a strong believer in equality for all under the law, and helped to free two men who had been wrongly sent to prison. Important changes were then made to British law to make it more difficult for innocent people to be sent to prison. This story is told in Julian Barnes's 2005 novel, Arthur and George.

After the deaths of his son, his brother and his two nephews in World War I, Conan Doyle became interested in the spiritual world and the search for scientific proof of life after death. He died in 1930, aged seventy-one. He had done many interesting things in his life but, like Moriarty, had been unable to kill Sherlock Holmes. Even today, people write to Holmes's Baker Street address (now a bank), asking for the detective's help and advice. Sherlock Holmes never really existed, but he always refused to die. To his readers, he is still alive today – the greatest detective that the world has ever known.

The Man with the Twisted Lip

Mr Isa Whitney was, and had been for many years, an opium addict. He could not get rid of the habit. He had once been a fine man, but now people only pitied this bent, unfortunate person with the yellow, unhealthy face. Opium was both his ruin and his only pleasure.

One night in June, when it was almost time to go to bed, I heard the doorbell ring. I sat up in my chair, and Mary, my wife, put her sewing down in annoyance.

'A patient!' she said. 'At this hour!'

We heard the servant open the front door and speak to someone. A moment later the door of our sitting room was thrown open and a lady came in. She wore a black veil over her face.

'Please forgive me for calling on you so late,' she began. But then she could no longer control her feelings. She ran forward, threw her arms round Mary's neck, and cried bitterly on her shoulder. 'Oh, I'm in such trouble!' she said. 'I need help so much!'

'Well!' said my wife, pulling up the visitor's veil. 'It's Kate Whitney. This is a surprise, Kate! I had no idea who you were when you came in.'

'I didn't know what to do, and so I came straight to you.'

That was how it always happened. People who were in trouble came to my wife like birds to a lighthouse.

'We are very glad to see you,' Mary said. 'Now you must have some wine and water, and sit here comfortably and tell us all about it. Or would you like me to send John off to bed?'

'Oh, no, no! I want the doctor's advice and help too. It's about

Isa. He hasn't been home for two days. I'm so worried about him!'

This was not the first time that Mrs Whitney had spoken to us of her husband's bad ways: she and Mary had been at school together. We did our best to calm her down and comfort her.

'Have you any idea where he has gone?' I asked.

'Yes,' Mrs Whitney replied. 'He's probably at a place called the Bar of Gold, in East London, down by the river. It's in Upper Swandam Street. It's a place where opium addicts go. This is the first time that Isa has spent more than a day there.'

I was Isa Whitney's doctor and had a certain influence with him.

'I will go to this place,' I said. 'If he is there, I will send him home in a carriage within two hours.'

Five minutes later I had left my comfortable chair and sitting room and was in a fast carriage on my way east.

NP
Upper Swandam Street was on the north side of the river, to the east of London Bridge. The Bar of Gold was below the level of the street. Some steep steps led down to the entrance, which was little more than a hole in the wall. There was an oil lamp hanging above the door. I ordered the driver to wait, and went down the steps.

Inside, it was difficult to see very much through the thick brown opium smoke. Wooden beds lined the walls of a long, low room. In the shadows I could just see bodies lying in strange positions on the beds; and little red circles of light burning in the bowls of metal pipes. Most of the smokers lay silently, but some talked softly to themselves. Near one end of the room was a fireplace, in which a small fire was burning. A tall, thin old man sat there, his elbows on his knees, looking into the fire.

A Malayan servant who belonged to the place came up to me with some opium and a pipe. He pointed to an empty bed.

'No, thank you,' I said. 'I haven't come to stay. There is a friend of mine here, Mr Isa Whitney, and I want to speak to him.'

A man on one of the beds suddenly sat up, and I recognized Whitney. He was pale, untidy, and wild-looking.

'Watson!' he cried. 'Tell me, Watson, what time is it?'

'Nearly eleven o'clock.'

'On what day?'

'Friday, June the 19th.'

'Good heavens! I thought it was Wednesday.'

'No, it's Friday. And your wife has been waiting two days for you. You ought to be ashamed of yourself!'

He began to cry. 'I was sure I had been here only a few hours! But I'll go home with you. I don't want to worry Kate – poor little Kate! Give me your hand: I can't do anything for myself. Have you come in a carriage?'

'Yes, I have one waiting.'

'Good. But I must owe something here. Find out what I owe them, Watson.'

As I walked along the narrow passage between the beds, looking for the manager, I felt someone touch my arm. It was the tall man by the fire. 'Walk past me, and then look back at me,' he said. When I looked again he was still leaning over the fire – a bent, tired old man. Suddenly he looked up and smiled at me. I recognized Sherlock Holmes.

'Holmes!' I whispered. 'What on earth are you doing in this terrible place?'

'Speak more quietly! I have excellent ears. Please get rid of that friend of yours. I want to talk to you.'

'I have a carriage waiting outside.'

'Then send him home in it. And I suggest that you give the driver a note for your wife. Tell her you are with me. And wait outside for me: I'll be with you in five minutes.'

NP
In a few minutes I had written my note, paid Whitney's bill, led him out to the carriage, and said good night to him. Then Holmes came out of the Bar of Gold, and we walked along together. At first he walked unsteadily, with a bent back, but after the first few streets he straightened up and laughed loudly.

'I suppose you think I have become an opium addict, Watson!' he said.

'I was certainly surprised to find you in that place,' I replied.

'And I was surprised to see you there!'

'I came to find a friend.'

'And I came to find an enemy!'

'An enemy?'

'Yes, Watson, one of my natural enemies – a criminal! I am working on one of my cases. I fear that Mr Neville Saint Clair entered the Bar of Gold and that he will never come out of the place alive. There is a door at the back of the building that opens onto the river. I believe that many men have been murdered there, and that their bodies have been thrown out through that door. If I had been recognized, the evil Indian sailor who owns the place would have murdered me too! I have used the Bar of Gold before for my own purposes, and have often found useful clues there in the conversation of the opium addicts. The owner has sworn to have his revenge on me for it.' Suddenly Holmes whistled loudly. 'The carriage should be here by now!' he said.

We heard an answering whistle in the distance. Then we saw the yellow lamps of the carriage as it came near.

'Now, Watson, you will come with me, won't you?' said Holmes, as he climbed in.

'If I can be of any use.'

'Oh, a friend is always useful. And my room at the Saint Clairs' has two beds.'

'At the Saint Clairs?'

'Yes. I am staying there while I work on the case.'

'Where is it, then?'

'Near Lee, in Kent. It's a seven-mile drive. Come on!'

'But I don't know anything about your case!'

'Of course you don't. But you soon will! Jump up here. All right, Harold,' he said to the driver, 'we shan't need you.' He handed the man a coin. 'Look out for me tomorrow at about eleven o'clock. Good night!'

For the first part of our drive Holmes was silent and I waited patiently for him to begin.

'I have been wondering what I can say to that dear little woman tonight when she meets me at the door,' he said at last. 'I am talking about Mrs Saint Clair, of course.'

'Neville Saint Clair came to live near Lee five years ago. He took a large house and lived like a rich man. He gradually made friends in the neighbourhood, and two years ago he married the daughter of a local farmer, by whom he now has two children. Neville Saint Clair was a businessman in London. He used to leave home every morning and then catch the 5.14 train back from Cannon Street Station each evening. If he is still alive he is now thirty-seven years old. He has no bad habits; he is a good husband and father, and everybody likes him. He has debts of £88 at present, but his bank account contains £220. There is no reason, therefore, to think that he has any money troubles.'

'Last Monday he went into London rather earlier than usual. He said that he had two important pieces of business to do that day. He also promised to buy his little boy a box of toy bricks. Now, that same day his wife happened to receive a telegram from the Aberdeen Shipping Company. This informed her that a valuable package which she was expecting had arrived at the Company's offices in London. These offices are in Fresno Street, which is off Upper Swandam Street, where you found me tonight. Mrs Saint Clair had her lunch, caught a train to London, did some shopping, and then went to the shipping company's offices. When she came out it was 4.35. She walked slowly along Upper Swandam Street, hoping to find a carriage. It was a very hot day, and she did not like the neighbourhood at all. Suddenly she heard a cry, and saw her husband looking down at her from a window on the first floor of one of the houses. He seemed to be waving to her, as if he wanted her to come up. The window was open, and she had a clear view of his face. He looked very worried and nervous. She noticed that he had no collar or tie on; but he was wearing a dark coat like the one he had put on that morning. Then, very suddenly, somebody seemed to pull him back from the window.

'Mrs Saint Clair felt sure that something was seriously wrong. She saw that the entrance to the house was below ground level: this was the door of the Bar of Gold. She rushed down the steps and through the front room, and tried to go up the stairs which led to the upper part of the house. But the owner – the Indian sailor I spoke of – ran downstairs and pushed her back. The Malayan servant helped him to push her out into the street. She rushed along Upper Swandam Street and into Fresno Street, where she fortunately found several policemen. They forced their way into the Bar of Gold and went upstairs to the room in which Mr Saint Clair had last been seen. There was no sign of him there. In fact the only person in the upper part of the house was an ugly cripple who lived there. Both the Indian and this cripple swore that no one else had been in the first-floor front room that afternoon. The policemen were beginning to believe that Mrs Saint Clair had been mistaken when suddenly she noticed a small wooden box on the table. Realizing what it contained, she tore the lid off and emptied out children's bricks. It was the toy that her husband had promised to bring home for his little boy.

'Of course the rooms were now examined very carefully, and the police found signs of a terrible crime. The front room was an ordinary room with plain furniture, and led into a small bedroom, from which the river could be seen. Along the edge of the river there is a narrow piece of ground which is dry at low tide, but which is covered at high tide by at least four and a half feet of water. At that time of day the river is at its highest point. There were drops of blood on the window, and a few drops on the bedroom floor too. Behind a curtain in the front room the police found all Neville Saint Clair's clothes except his coat. His shoes, his socks, his hat and his watch – everything was there. There were no signs of violence on any of the clothes, and Mr Saint Clair, alive or dead, was certainly not there. He seemed to have gone out of the window – there was no other possibility.

'The Indian had often been in trouble with the police before. But as Mrs Saint Clair had seen him at the foot of the stairs only a few seconds after her husband's appearance at the window, he could not have been responsible for the murder. He said that he knew nothing about the clothes which had been found in the cripple's rooms. The cripple himself, whose name is Hugh Boone, must have been the last person to see Neville Saint Clair.

'Boone is a well-known London beggar who always sits in Threadneedle Street, near the Bank of England. He pretends to be a match seller, but there is always a dirty leather cap by his side into which people throw coins. I have watched him more than once, and I have been surprised at the very large amount of money that he receives in this way. His appearance, you see, is so unusual that no one can go past without noticing him. He has a pale face and long red hair, and bright brown eyes. His upper lip is twisted as the result of an old accident. And he is famous for his clever answers to the jokes of all the businessmen who go past.'

'Is it possible that a cripple could have murdered a healthy young man like Neville Saint Clair?' I asked.

'Hugh Boone's body is bent and his face is ugly,' Holmes replied, 'but there is great strength in him. Cripples are often very strong, you know. When the police were searching him, they noticed some spots of blood on one of the arms of his shirt. But he showed them a cut on his finger, and explained that the blood had come from there. He also said that he had been at the window not long before, and that the blood on the floor and window probably came from his finger too. He refused to admit that he had ever seen Mr Saint Clair, and swore that the presence of the clothes in the room was as much a mystery to him as it was to the police. If Mrs Saint Clair said she had seen her husband at the window she must have been dreaming – or else she was crazy! Boone was taken to the police station, still complaining loudly.

'When the water level in the river had gone down, the police looked for the body of Mr Saint Clair in the mud. But they only found his coat. And every pocket was full of pennies and halfpennies – 421 pennies, and 270 halfpennies. It was not surprising that the coat had not been carried away by the tide. But possibly the body itself had been swept away. Perhaps Boone pushed Saint Clair through the window, and then decided to get rid of the clothing, which might give clues to the police. But he needed to be sure that the clothes would sink. So he went to the hiding place where he kept the money he earned in Threadneedle Street, and began by filling the pockets of the coat and throwing it out. He would have done the same with the rest of the clothing, but just then he heard the police coming up the stairs, and quickly closed the window.

'Boone has been a professional beggar for many years, but he has never been in any serious trouble with the police. He seems to live very quietly and harmlessly. I have to find out what Neville Saint Clair was doing in that house, what happened to him while he was there, where he is now, and what Hugh Boone's involvement was in his disappearance. The problem seemed to be an easy one at first, but now I don't think it is so easy.

'Do you see that light among the trees? That is the Saint Clairs' house. Beside that lamp an anxious woman is sitting listening, probably, for the sound of our horse.'

We drove through some private grounds, and stopped in front of a large house. A servant ran out to take charge of our horse. The front door opened before we had reached it, and a small fair woman in a pink silk dress hurried out to meet us.

'Well?' she cried eagerly. 'Well?'

Perhaps she thought for a moment that Holmes's friend was her lost husband.

Holmes shook his head.

'No good news?' she asked.

'None.'

'But no bad news either?'

'No.'

'Well, come in. You must be very tired. You have had a long day's work.'

'This is my friend Dr Watson. He has been of great use to me in several of my cases. By a lucky chance he has been able to come with me this evening.'

'I am pleased to meet you,' said Mrs Saint Clair, pressing my hand warmly. She led us into a pleasant dining room, where there was a cold supper laid out on the table. 'Now, Mr Sherlock Holmes, I have one or two questions to ask you, and I should like you to answer them truthfully.'

'Certainly, Mrs Saint Clair.'

'It is your real opinion that I want to know.'

'About what?' Holmes asked.

'Do you truly believe that Neville is still alive?'

Holmes did not seem to like this question. 'Truly, now!' she repeated, looking at him as he leaned back in his chair.

'Truly, then, I do not,' he answered at last.

'You think he is dead?'

'Yes.'

'And that he was murdered?'

'I don't know. Perhaps.'

'And on what day did he die?'

'On Monday, June the 15th.'

'Then, Mr Holmes, how do you explain this letter that I have received from him today?'

Sherlock Holmes jumped out of his chair. 'What!' he shouted.

'Yes, today.' Smiling, she held up an envelope.

'May I see it?'

'Certainly.'

In his eagerness he seized it from her quite rudely, smoothed it out on the table, and examined it very thoroughly. I looked at it over his shoulder. The envelope was a cheap one, and it had been posted at Gravesend in Kent earlier in the day.

'The handwriting on the envelope is poor,' said Holmes. 'Surely this is not your husband's writing, Mrs Saint Clair?'

'No, but the letter inside is in his handwriting.'

'I see that whoever addressed the envelope had to go and find out your address.'

'How can you tell that?'

'The name, you see, is in perfectly black ink, and has been allowed to dry slowly. The address is almost grey – which proves that sand has been thrown on the writing to dry it. The man who wrote this envelope wrote the name first, and then paused for some time before writing the address. The only explanation is that he did not know it. But let us look at the letter! Ah! some object has been enclosed in this.'

'Yes,' said Mrs Saint Clair, 'there was a ring. Neville's ring.'

'And are you sure that this is in your husband's writing?'

'Yes – though it's easy to see that he wrote it in a great hurry.'

This is what the letter said:

Dearest Olivia,

Do not be frightened. Everything will be all right. There is a mistake that it will take some time to put right. Wait patiently.

NEVILLE.

'This,' said Holmes, 'is written in pencil on a page torn from some book. It was posted by a man with a dirty thumb. And whoever closed the envelope had a lump of tobacco in his mouth. Well, Mrs Saint Clair, things are beginning to seem a little more hopeful, but I do not think the danger is over yet.'

'But Neville must be alive, Mr Holmes!'

'Unless this letter is the work of a clever man. After all, the ring proves nothing. It may have been taken from him.'

'No, no! That's certainly his own handwriting!'

'Very well. But the letter may have been written on Monday, and only posted today.'

'That is possible.'

'If that is so, many things may have happened between the two days.'

'Oh, you must not make me lose hope, Mr Holmes! I know that Neville is all right. Our relationship is such a strong one that I always know when he has an accident. On that last morning he cut himself in the bedroom, and although I was in the dining room, I knew immediately that something had happened to him. I rushed upstairs and found that I was right. Do you think I could possibly not know about it if he had been murdered?'

'But if your husband is alive and able to write letters, why should he remain away from you?'

'I can't imagine!'

'And on Monday he said nothing unusual before leaving home?'

'Nothing.'

'And you were surprised to see him at that window in Upper Swandam Street?'

'Yes, extremely surprised.'

'Was the window open?'

'Yes.'

'Then he could have spoken to you?'

'He could. But he only cried out, as if he were calling for help. And he waved his hands.'

'But it might have been a cry of surprise. Shock at the sight of you might cause him to throw up his hands.'

'It is possible. But I thought he was pulled back from the window.'

'He might have jumped back. You did not see anyone else in the room, did you?'

'No, but that ugly cripple admitted that he was there, and the owner of the place was at the foot of the stairs.'

'Did your husband seem to be wearing his ordinary clothes?'

'Yes, but he had no collar or tie on. I saw the skin of his throat quite clearly.'

'Had he ever mentioned Upper Swandam Street to you?'

'Never.'

'Had he ever shown any signs of having taken opium?'

'No, never!'

'Thank you, Mrs Saint Clair. We will now have a little supper and then go to bed. We may have a very busy day tomorrow.'

NP But Holmes did not go to bed that night. He was a man who sometimes stayed awake for a whole week when he was working on one of his cases. He filled his pipe. Then he sat down, crossed his legs, and looked with fixed eyes at the ceiling. I was already in bed and soon went to sleep.

Holmes was still smoking when I woke up next morning. It was a bright sunny day, but the room was full of tobacco smoke.

'Are you awake, Watson?'

'Yes.'

'Would you like to come for an early-morning drive?'

'All right.'

'Then get dressed! Nobody is up yet, but I know where the servant who looks after the horses sleeps. We shall soon have the carriage on the road!' Holmes laughed to himself as he spoke. He seemed to be a different man from the Holmes of the night before.

As I dressed, I looked at my watch. It was not surprising that nobody in the house was up: it was only 4.25.

Soon Holmes came back and told me that the carriage was ready.

'I want to test a little idea of mine,' he said as he put his shoes on. 'I think, Watson, that I am the most stupid man in Europe. I deserve to be kicked from here to London. But I think I have found the explanation of Neville Saint Clair's disappearance now. Yes, Watson, I think I have the key to the mystery!'

'And where is it?' I asked, smiling.

'In the bathroom,' he answered. 'Oh, yes, I am not joking,' he went on, seeing the surprise on my face. 'I have been there, and I have taken it out, and I have it in this bag. Come on, Watson, and let us see whether this key is the right one.'

The carriage was waiting for us in the bright morning sunshine. We both jumped in, and the horse rushed off along the London road. A few country vehicles were about, taking fruit to the London markets, but the houses on either side of the road were as silent and lifeless as in a dream.

'Oh, I have been blind, Watson!' said Holmes. 'But it is better to learn wisdom late than never to learn it at all.'

In London, a few people were beginning to look out sleepily from their windows as we drove through the streets on the south side of the city. We went down Waterloo Bridge Road and across the river; then along Wellington Street. We stopped at Bow Street Police Station. The two policemen at the door touched their hats to Holmes, who was well known there. One of them looked after the horse while the other led us in.

'Who is the officer on duty this morning?' asked Holmes.

'Mr Bradstreet, sir,' answered the man.

A large fat man came down the passage just then.

'Ah, Bradstreet, how are you?' said Holmes. 'I'd like to have a word with you.'

'Certainly, Mr Holmes. Let us go into my room.'

It was a small office, with a desk and a telephone. Bradstreet sat down.

'What can I do for you, Mr Holmes?'

'I am here in connection with Hugh Boone, the beggar – the man who has been charged with involvement in the disappearance of Mr Neville Saint Clair.'

'Yes. We are still busy with that case.'

'You have Boone here?'

'Yes. He's locked up.'

'Is he quiet?'

'Oh, he gives no trouble. But he's a dirty man.'

'Dirty?'

'Yes. He doesn't mind washing his hands, but his face is as black as a coal miner's. Well, as soon as his case is settled, he'll have to have a proper prison bath!'

'I should very much like to see him.'

'Would you? That can easily be arranged. Come this way. You can leave your bag here.'

'No, I think I'll take it with me.'

'Very good. Come this way, please.' He led us down a passage, opened a barred door, and took us down some stairs to another white passage. There was a row of doors on each side.

'The third door on the right is his,' said Bradstreet. 'Here it is!' He looked through a hole in the upper part of the door.

'He's asleep. You can see him very well.'

NP Holmes and I both looked through the hole. The prisoner lay with his face towards us, in a very deep sleep, breathing slowly and heavily. He was a man of medium height, dressed in a torn coat and a coloured shirt. As Bradstreet had said, he was extremely dirty. One side of his top lip was turned up, so that three teeth were showing. He looked like an angry dog. His head was covered almost down to the eyes with very bright red hair.

'He's a beauty, isn't he?' said Bradstreet.

'He certainly needs a wash,' Holmes replied. 'I had an idea that he might be dirty, and so I brought this with me.' He took a wet cloth out of his bag.

'What a funny man you are, Mr Holmes!' laughed Bradstreet.

'Now, Bradstreet, open that door as quietly as possible, please.'

'All right.' And Bradstreet slipped his big key into the lock, and we all went in very quietly. The sleeping man half turned, and then settled down once more. Holmes stepped quickly over to him and rubbed the cloth firmly across and down his face.

'Let me introduce you,' he shouted, 'to Mr Neville Saint Clair, of Lee in Kent!'

The effect of Holmes's cloth was unbelievable. The skin of the man's face seemed to come off like paper, taking the twisted lip with it. Holmes took hold of the untidy red hair and pulled it off too. The ugly beggar had changed into a pale, sad-faced young gentleman with black hair and a smooth skin. He sat up in his bed and rubbed his eyes, looking round sleepily. Then he realized what had just happened, gave a terrible cry, and hid his face.

'Good heavens!' cried Bradstreet. 'It certainly is the missing man. I recognize him from the photograph.'

By now the prisoner had managed to control himself. 'And what,' he asked, 'am I charged with?'

'With being concerned in the disappearance of Mr Neville Saint–' Bradstreet began. 'But of course you can't be charged with that! Well, I have been a member of the police force for twenty-seven years, and I have never seen anything like this!'

'If I am Neville Saint Clair, no crime has been done. It is clear that you are breaking the law by keeping me here.'

'No crime has been done,' said Holmes, 'but you ought to have trusted your wife.'

'It was not my wife that I was worried about. It was the children! I didn't want them to be ashamed of their father. And what can I do now?'

Sherlock Holmes sat down beside him on the bed, and touched his shoulder kindly.

'I advise you to tell everything to Mr Bradstreet,' he said. 'It may not be necessary for the case to come into court. Your story will probably never be mentioned in the newspapers. Your children need never find out about it.'

Saint Clair gave him a grateful look.

'I will tell you the whole story.

NP
'My father was a schoolmaster in Derbyshire, where I received an excellent education. I travelled a great deal after I left school. I was an actor for a time, and then became a reporter for an evening paper in London. One day I was asked to write a series of pieces about begging in London. It was then that all my adventures started. I decided that the best way of collecting facts would be to become a beggar myself, just for one day. When I was an actor I had, of course, learned all the skills of make-up, and I now made good use of them. I painted my face and gave my upper lip an ugly twist so that people would pity me. Red hair and old clothes were the only other things necessary. I then placed myself in one of the busiest streets in London. I pretended to be a match seller, but I was really a beggar. I stayed there for seven hours. At home that evening I was surprised to find that I had received more than a pound.

'I wrote my pieces, and thought no more of the matter for some time. Then I signed my name on a paper for a friend who wanted to borrow some money; he was unable to pay his debt, and so I found that I owed twenty-five pounds. I did not know what to do. Suddenly I had an idea. I asked for two weeks' holiday, and spent the time begging in Threadneedle Street. In ten days I had the money and had paid the debt.

'Well, you can imagine how difficult it was to settle down to hard work on the newspaper at two pounds a week, when I knew that I could earn as much as that in a single day! I only had to paint my face, put my cap on the ground, and sit still. Of course it hurt my pride to do it, but in the end I gave up my post, and sat day after day in the corner I had first chosen. My ugly face made everybody pity me, and my pockets quickly filled with money. Only one man knew my secret. This was the owner of the Bar of Gold in Upper Swandam Street, an Indian sailor. It was there that I changed myself into an ugly beggar each morning, and there that I became a well-dressed businessman again in the evenings. I paid the man well for his rooms, so I knew that my secret was safe with him.

'Well, very soon I realized that I was saving money fast. I do not mean that any beggar in the streets of London could earn seven or eight hundred pounds a year, but I had unusual advantages. My knowledge of make-up helped me a great deal, and my jokes quickly made me almost a public figure. All day and every day, the money poured into my cap. I usually received at least two pounds in a day. I was almost a rich man.

'I was able to take a large house in the country, and later to marry. Nobody had any idea where my money really came from. My dear wife knew that I had a business in London: that was all.

'Last Monday I had finished for the day, and was dressing in my room in Upper Swandam Street, when I saw my wife outside. She was looking up at me. This was a great shock to me, and I gave a cry of surprise and threw up my arms to cover my face. I rushed downstairs and begged the owner of the place to prevent anyone from coming up to me. Then I ran upstairs again, took off my clothes, and put on those of 'Hugh Boone'. I heard my wife's voice downstairs, but I knew that she would not be able to come up. I put on my make-up and my false hair as fast as I could. Just then, I realized that the police might search my rooms. I did not want my own clothes to be found. I filled the coat pockets with coins, and opened the window. I had cut my finger at home that morning, and the cut opened again. I threw the heavy coat out of the window and saw it disappear into the river. I would have thrown the other clothes out too, but just then I heard the policemen rushing up the stairs. A few minutes later I was seized as my own murderer! But I was happy that nobody realized who I was.

'I was determined not to be recognized, and so I refused to wash my face. I knew that my wife would be very anxious about me, and I therefore slipped off my ring and found an opportunity to give it to the owner of the Bar of Gold, together with a short letter to her.'

'Mrs Saint Clair did not get that note until yesterday,' said Holmes.

'Good heavens! What a terrible week she must have had!'

'The police have been watching the Indian,' said Bradstreet, 'and he must have had great difficulty in posting the letter without being seen. He probably handed it to one of the sailors who come to the Bar of Gold to smoke opium. The man may have forgotten to post it until yesterday.'

'I think you are right,' said Holmes. 'Mr Saint Clair, have you never been charged with begging in the streets?'

'Oh, yes, I have often been to court. But I could easily afford the money I had to pay!'

'Your life as a beggar must stop now,' said Bradstreet. 'If Hugh Boone appears once more in the streets of London we shall not be able to prevent the newspaper reporters from writing about the case.'

'I swear never to beg again,' said Saint Clair.

'In that case you will hear no more of the matter,' said Bradstreet. 'But if you are ever found begging again, everything will have to be made public. Mr Holmes, we are very grateful to you for your successful handling of the case. I wish I knew how you got your results!'

'I found the explanation of this affair by sitting in a comfortable armchair and smoking my pipe all night,' answered my friend. 'I think, Watson, that if we drive to Baker Street now, we shall be just in time for breakfast.'

The Engineer's Thumb

The exciting affair of Mr Hatherley's thumb happened in the summer of 1889, not long after my marriage. I was in practice as a doctor, but I often visited my friend Sherlock Holmes at his Baker Street rooms, and I sometimes even managed to persuade him to come and visit my wife and me. My practice had steadily become more successful, and as I happened to live near Paddington Station, I got a few patients from among the railway workers there. One of these, a guard whom I had cured of a painful disease, was always praising my skill and trying to persuade new patients to come to me.

One morning, a little before seven o'clock, I was woken by our servant knocking at the bedroom door. She said that two men had come from Paddington Station and were waiting in my office. I dressed quickly and hurried downstairs. I knew from experience that railway cases were usually serious. Before I had reached the office, my old friend the guard came out and closed the door tightly behind him.

'I've got him here,' he whispered, pointing over his shoulder with his thumb, as if he had caught some strange wild animal for me. 'It's a new patient. I thought I'd bring him here myself, so that he couldn't run away. I must go now, Doctor. I have my duties, just as you have.' And he was out of the house before I could thank him.

I entered my office, and found a gentleman seated by the table. He was dressed in a country suit, with a soft cloth cap, which he had put down on top of my books. There was a bloody cloth wrapped round one of his hands. He was young – not more than twenty-five, I thought. He had a strong face, but he was extremely pale, and seemed to be in a state of almost uncontrollable anxiety.

'I'm sorry to get you out of bed so early, Doctor,' he began. 'But I had a very serious accident during the night. I came back to London by train this morning, and at Paddington I asked the railway people where I could find a doctor. One good man very kindly brought me here. I gave your servant a card, but I see that she has left it over there on the side table.'

I picked it up and looked at it. 'Mr Victor Hatherley,' I read. 'Engineer, third floor, 16A Victoria Street.'

'I am sorry you have had to wait so long,' I said, sitting down. 'Your night journey must have been dull too.'

'Oh, my experiences during the night could not be called dull!' he said, and laughed. In fact he shook with such unnatural laughter that he sounded a little crazy.

'Stop it!' I cried. 'Control yourself!' I poured out a glass of water for him.

But it was useless. He went on laughing for some time. When at last he stopped he was very tired and ashamed of himself.

'It was stupid of me to laugh like that,' he said in a weak voice.

'Not at all.' I poured some brandy into the water. 'Drink this!'

Soon the colour began to return to his pale face. 'That's better!' he said. 'And now, doctor, would you mind looking at my thumb, or rather at the place where my thumb used to be?'

He took off the cloth and held out his hand. It was a terrible sight, and although I had been an army doctor I could hardly bear to look at it. Instead of a thumb there was only an uneven, swollen red surface. The thumb had been completely cut – or torn – off.

'Good heavens!' I cried. 'This is a terrible wound. It must have bled a great deal.'

'Yes, it did. I fainted when it happened; and I think I must have been unconscious for a long time. When I returned to consciousness, I found that it was still bleeding. So I tied one end of this cloth very tightly round my wrist, and used a small piece of wood to make it even tighter.'

'Excellent! You should have been a doctor.'

'I'm an engineer, you see: the force of liquids is my subject.'

'This has been done,' I said, examining the wound, 'by a very sharp, heavy instrument.'

'An axe,' he said.

'It was an accident, I suppose?'

'No!'

'Was somebody trying to murder you, then?'

'Yes.'

'How terrible!'

I cleaned the wound and bandaged it. He did not cry out as I worked on his hand, though he bit his lip from time to time.

'How are you feeling now?' I asked, when I had finished.

'I feel fine! Your brandy and your bandage have made me feel like a new man. I was very weak, but I have had some terrible experiences.'

'Perhaps you had better not speak of the matter. It upsets you too much.'

'Oh no! Not now. I shall have to tell everything to the police. But really, if I did not have this wound, the police might not believe my statement. It is a very strange story and I have not much proof of it. And I doubt whether justice will ever be done, because I can give the detectives so few clues.'

'In that case,' I said, 'I strongly advise you to see my friend Sherlock Holmes before you go to the police.'

'Oh, I have heard of Mr Holmes,' said my visitor, 'and I should be very glad if he would look into the matter, though of course I must inform the police as well. Would you write me a letter of introduction to him?'

'I'll do better than that. I'll take you round to him myself.'

'You're very kind.'

'We'll call a carriage and go together. We shall arrive just in time to have breakfast with him. Do you feel strong enough to go out?'

'Oh yes! I shall not feel comfortable in my mind until I have told my story.'

'Then my servant will call a carriage, and I shall be with you in a moment.' I rushed upstairs and quickly explained everything to my wife. Five minutes later Mr Hatherley and I were in a carriage on our way to Baker Street.

As I had expected, Sherlock Holmes was in his sitting room reading the small personal advertisements in The Times and smoking his pipe. For this early-morning smoke he used all the half-smoked lumps of tobacco from the day before, all carefully dried and collected together. He welcomed us in his usual quiet, pleasant way, and ordered more food for us. Then we all sat round the table and had a good breakfast. When we had finished, Holmes made Mr Hatherley lie down with a glass of brandy and water within reach.

'It is easy to see that your experience has been a strange and terrible one, Mr Hatherley,' he said. 'Please lie down there and make yourself completely at home. Tell us what you can, but stop and have a drink when you are tired.'

'Thank you,' said my patient, 'but I have been feeling quite fresh since the doctor bandaged me, and I think that your excellent breakfast has completed the cure. So I will begin the story of my strange experiences immediately.'

Holmes sat down in his big armchair. As usual, the sleepy expression on his face, and his half-closed eyes, hid his eagerness. I sat opposite him, and we listened in silence to the strange story our visitor told.

'My parents are dead,' he said, 'and I am unmarried. I live alone in rooms in London. By profession I am an engineer, and I have had seven years of training with Venner and Matheson of Greenwich, the well-known engineers. I completed my training two years ago. Not long before that, my father had died and I received some of his money. So I decided to go into business on my own, and took an office in Victoria Street.

"The first few years of independent practice are often disappointing. I myself have had an extremely disappointing start. In two years I have had only three or four jobs and have earned only twenty-seven pounds. Every day, from nine o'clock in the morning until four in the afternoon, I waited in my little office, until at last I began to lose heart. I thought that I would never get any work.

"But yesterday my clerk came in to say that a gentleman was waiting to see me on business. He brought in a card, too, with the name 'Captain Lysander Stark' printed on it. The Captain followed him into the room almost immediately. He was a tall, thin man. I do not think I have ever seen a thinner man than Captain Stark. He had a sharp nose and the skin of his face was pulled very tightly over the bones. But his thinness did not seem to be the result of any disease. His back was straight and his eyes were bright. He was plainly but neatly dressed, and seemed to be about thirty-five or forty years old.

"'Mr Hatherley?' he said, and I thought he sounded like a German. 'You have been recommended to me, Mr Hatherley, not only as an excellent engineer, but also as a man who can keep a secret.'

"This polite remark pleased me. 'May I ask who it was who spoke so well of me?' I said.

"'Well, perhaps I had better not tell you that just now. I have also heard that your parents are dead, and that you are unmarried and live alone in London.'

"'That is quite correct,' I answered. 'But I do not see what connection these things have with my professional ability. My clerk told me that you wished to speak to me about a professional matter.'

"'Yes, certainly. But everything I have said is important. I have work for you, but secrecy is necessary — complete secrecy. And of course we can expect greater secrecy from a man who is alone in the world than from one who lives with his family.'

"'If I promise to keep a secret,' I said, 'you can trust me to do so.'

"He looked at me carefully as I spoke. 'You do promise, then?' he said at last.

"'Yes, I promise.'

"'You promise complete silence, both before and after doing the work? You promise not to mention the matter at all, either in speech or in writing?'

"'I have already given you my word.'

"'Very good!' He suddenly jumped up, rushed across the room, and threw open the door. The passage outside was empty.

"'That's all right,' he said, coming back. 'I know that clerks are sometimes eager to know about their masters' affairs. Now it is safe to talk.' He pulled his chair up very close to mine, and once again began looking thoughtfully at me.

"I did not like this. I was beginning to feel impatient with this strange man.

"'Please tell me why you have come to see me, sir,' I said. 'My time is valuable.' Of course this was not really true!

"'Would fifty pounds for a night's work suit you?' he asked.

"'Yes, very well!'

"'I said a night's work, but in fact the work would hardly take an hour. I only want your opinion about a machine which is not working properly. If you show us what is wrong, we shall soon be able to put it right ourselves. Will you do it?'

"'Yes, I will,' I said. 'The work appears to be easy and the pay extremely generous.'

"'Yes. We want you to come tonight, by the last train.'

"'Where to?' I asked.

“To Eyford, in Berkshire. It is a little village about seven miles from Reading. There is a train from Paddington which will get you there at about a quarter past eleven.”

“Very good.”

“I will come to Eyford Station in a carriage to meet you.”

“Do you live far from the station, then?” I asked.

“Yes, our house is right out in the country – more than seven miles away.”

“Then we shall not reach your house before midnight. I suppose there are no trains back from Eyford to London in the middle of the night. I should have to sleep at your house.”

“Oh yes, we can easily give you a bed.”

“That is not very convenient. Couldn’t I come at some other time?”

“We have decided that the night is the best time. The unusually high pay will be your reward for the trouble. But of course you are perfectly free to refuse the work if you wish.”

“I thought of the fifty pounds – I thought how very useful the money would be to me. “I do not want to refuse,” I said. “I will do whatever you want. But I should like to understand a little more clearly what it is you wish me to do.”

“Of course. I will explain everything to you. But it is very secret. Are you quite sure that nobody can hear what we are saying?”

“Quite sure,” I replied.

“Then I will explain. A few years ago I bought a house and a small piece of land, about ten miles from Reading. I discovered that the soil in one of my fields contained Fuller’s earth.* Fuller’s earth, as you probably know, is a valuable substance, and is only found in one or two places in England. Unfortunately the amount of Fuller’s earth in my field was rather small. But to the right and left of it, in fields belonging to my neighbours, there were much larger quantities of the substance. My neighbours had no idea that their land was as valuable as a gold mine. Naturally it was in my interest to buy their land before they discovered its true value; but unfortunately I had no capital with which to do this. So I told the secret to a few of my friends and they suggested that we should quietly and secretly dig out our own small quantity of Fuller’s earth; and that in this way we would earn enough money to buy the neighbouring fields. We have been working secretly like this for some time. One of the machines we use is a press. This press, as I have already explained, is not working properly, and we want your advice on the subject. We guard our secret very carefully, and if our neighbours found out that an engineer had visited our little house, our discovery about the Fuller’s earth would not be a secret any longer and we would have no chance at all of buying those fields and carrying out our plans. That is why I have made you promise me that you will not tell a single human being that you are going to Eyford tonight. Do you understand?”

* Fuller’s earth: a natural earthy material that is useful in many industrial processes.

“Yes,” I answered. “But one point that I do not quite understand is this: how can a press be of any use to you in digging Fuller’s earth out of the ground?”

“Ah!” he said carelessly. “We have our own special way. We use the press to turn the Fuller’s earth into bricks so that we can remove the substance without letting the neighbours know what it is. But that is just a detail. I have taken you into my confidence now, Mr Hatherley, and have shown you that I trust you.” He rose as he spoke. “I shall expect you, then, at Eyford at 11.15.”

“I will certainly be there.”

“And do not say a word about it to anybody!” He gave me a last long, questioning look, and then, pressing my hand in his, he hurried from the room.

“Well, gentlemen, when I was alone again, I thought a lot about this visitor and his unusual request. Of course I was glad in a way, because the money he had offered was at least ten times as much as the ordinary pay for such a piece of work. And it was possible that this opportunity would lead to others. But the face and manner of this man had given me a strange feeling, and I did not believe that the story of the Fuller's earth really explained the necessity for a midnight visit, or the conditions of extreme secrecy that were connected with it. But I put my fears to one side, ate a large supper, drove to Paddington, and started off for Eyford. I had obeyed Captain Stark's instructions and had spoken to nobody.

'At Reading I had to change stations, and I caught the last train to Eyford. I reached the dark little station after eleven o'clock. I was the only passenger who got out there, and the only person at the station was a single sleepy railwayman, holding an oil lamp. As I passed through the gate from the station I found Captain Stark waiting in the shadows on the other side of the road. Without speaking, he seized me by the arm and hurried me into a carriage. He pulled up the windows on both sides, knocked on the woodwork as a signal to the driver, and we set off as fast as the horse could go.'

'One horse?' Holmes interrupted.

'Yes, only one.'

'Did you notice what colour it was?'

'Yes, I saw by the light of the carriage lamps as I was stepping in. It was light brown.'

'Was it tired-looking, or fresh?'

'Oh, its coat looked quite fresh.'

'Thank you. I am sorry to have interrupted you. Please continue your very interesting story.'

'We drove for at least an hour. Captain Stark had said that it was only about seven miles, but the time the journey took and the speed at which we travelled made me think it was really ten or twelve. He sat at my side in silence, watching me carefully all the time. The country roads must have been rather bad, as the carriage shook and moved violently up and down as we went along. I tried to look out of the windows to see where we were, but they were made of coloured glass and I could see nothing except occasional faint lights. Now and then I spoke to the Captain, but he answered only 'Yes' or 'No' and the conversation went no further. At last, the shaking of the carriage stopped, and we drove over a smooth private road: our journey was over. Captain Stark jumped out, and, as I followed, pulled me quickly through the open front door of the house. We stepped right out of the carriage into the hall, so that I was quite unable to get any idea of what the outside of the house looked like. As soon as I was inside the house the door was shut violently behind us, and I heard the faint sound of wheels as the carriage drove away.

'It was completely dark inside the house, and the Captain began looking for matches, talking to himself as he did so. Suddenly a door opened at the other end of the passage, and a golden beam of light appeared. It grew wider, and I saw a woman with a lamp, which she held above her head, pushing her face forward to look at us. I could see that she was pretty, and expensively dressed. She said a few words in a foreign language, and when my companion answered with a single cold word, his reply gave her such a shock that she nearly dropped the lamp. Captain Stark went up to her, whispered something in her ear, and pushed her back into the room she had come out of. Then he walked back towards me with the lamp in his hand, and opened the door of another room.

"Please be kind enough to wait in this room for a few minutes," he said.

'It was a small, plain room, with a round table in the centre. There were several German books scattered on this table. The Captain put the lamp down on a smaller table by the door. "I will not keep you waiting long," he said, and disappeared into the darkness.

"I looked at the books on the table, and although I do not understand German I could see that two of them were on scientific subjects. The others were books of poetry. Then I walked across to the window, hoping to see a little of the surroundings of the house. But strong heavy boards were nailed across the window on the outside. It was an unusually silent house. The only sound came from an old clock somewhere in the passage. I felt myself becoming more and more anxious. Who were these German people, and what were they doing, living in this strange, out-of-the-way place? And where was the place? I only knew that it was ten or twelve miles from Eyford, but I had no idea whether it was north, south, east or west. Of course Reading, and possibly other large towns, were about the same distance away. But the complete stillness made it clear that Captain Stark's house was right out in the country. I walked anxiously up and down the room, singing to myself under my breath to give myself courage, and feeling that I was thoroughly earning my fifty pounds!

"Then, without a sound, the door of the room swung slowly open, and I saw the woman standing there. Behind her was the darkness of the hall, and the yellow light from my lamp shone on her eager and beautiful face. It was easy to see that she was in a state of extreme fear, and as a result my own blood turned to ice. She held up one shaking finger to warn me to be silent. Her eyes, as she looked back into the dark passage, were like those of a frightened horse.

"You must go away!" she whispered in broken English, with an effort to speak calmly. "There is no good here for you to do."

"But I have not yet done what I came to do. I cannot possibly leave until I have seen the machine."

"You will gain nothing by staying," she went on. "You can pass through the door; nobody prevents you." And then, seeing that I only smiled and shook my head, she suddenly gave up her attempt to speak calmly, and took a step forward. "For the love of heaven!" she said, stretching out her hands towards me, "Get away from here before it is too late!"

"But it is not easy to make me change my mind, and difficulties only make me more determined. I thought of my fifty pounds, of the tiring journey I had just made, and of the unpleasant night that was just beginning. Must all this be completely wasted? Why should I run away without carrying out my orders, and without receiving my pay for the night's work? Maybe this woman was crazy! Though her warning had worried me, I still shook my head firmly, and said I would stay. She would have gone on trying to persuade me, but just then we heard the noisy closing of a door upstairs, and the sound of footsteps on the stairs. She listened for a moment, threw up her hands in hopelessness, and then disappeared as suddenly and silently as she had come.

"When Captain Stark came back into the room, there was another man with him. This second man was short and fat, with a beard like a goat's growing out of the folds of his round face. The Captain introduced him to me as Mr Ferguson.

"Mr Ferguson is my secretary and manager" said the Captain. Then he gave me a strange look and said: "Mr Hatherley, I had the idea that I left this door shut just now."

"Yes," I replied, "but the room seemed a little airless, and so I opened the door to let some air in."

"Well, perhaps we had better begin our business now. Mr Ferguson and I will take you up to see the machine."

"I had better put my hat on, I suppose," I said.

"Oh no, it is in the house."

"What! Do you dig Fuller's earth in the house?"

"No, no. This is only where we press it into bricks. But never mind that! All we wish you to do is to examine the machine and to let us know what is wrong with it.”

‘We went upstairs together, the Captain first with the lamp, the fat manager and myself behind him. It was the kind of old house in which it would be easy to get lost – full of passages, narrow stairways, and little low doors. There were no floor coverings, and above the ground floor there seemed to be no furniture at all. I tried to appear calm and cheerful, but I had not forgotten the warnings of the lady, and I watched my two companions anxiously. Ferguson appeared to be a bad-tempered and silent man, but I could tell from his voice that he was at least an Englishman.

‘At last Captain Stark stopped outside a low door, which he unlocked. The room inside was small and square – so small, in fact, that the three of us could hardly have gone inside at the same time. Ferguson remained outside, and I went in with the Captain.

“‘We are now” he said, “actually inside the press, and it would be extremely unpleasant for us if anyone turned it on. The ceiling of this little room is really the moving part of the press, and it comes down with very great force on this metal floor. The machine still works, but it seems to be sticking and it has lost some of its power. I should like you to examine it, please, and to show us how we can put it right.”

‘I took the lamp from him, and examined the machine very thoroughly. It was certainly a very large and powerful one. When I went back outside and pressed down the handles that controlled it, I could tell from the soft whistling sound that there was a slight escape of water from one part into another. This was the explanation for the loss of pressure. A further examination showed that one of the rubber seals in the press had become worn and thin, and this was how the water was escaping. I pointed this out to my companions, who listened very carefully to what I said, and asked several questions about what they should do to put the problem right. When I had made it clear to them, I went back inside the machine, and had another good look at it – to satisfy my own desire to find out what it was. I realized that the story of the Fuller’s earth was a complete lie: it was impossible to believe that such a powerful machine could be intended for such a purpose. The walls were made of wood, but the floor was like a kind of iron bath. When I examined this more closely I saw that it was coated with another sort of metal, in a fine powder. I had bent down and was feeling this to find out exactly what it was, when I heard a few angry words in German and saw the Captain looking down at me.

“‘What are you doing in there?” he asked.

‘I was feeling angry with him for telling me lies. “I was admiring your Fuller’s earth,” I said. “I think you ought to have told me the real purpose of your machine before asking me to advise you about it.”

‘As soon as I had spoken, I wished I had not. A cold, hard expression came into Captain Stark’s face, and I saw that his grey eyes were full of hatred.

“‘Very well!” he said. “I will show you everything about the machine!” He took a step backwards, shut the little door and quickly turned the key. I rushed towards it and pulled at the handle. Then I pushed and kicked at the door, but it held firm. “Captain Stark! Captain Stark!” I shouted. “Let me out!”

‘And then suddenly in the silence I heard a sound that sent my heart to my mouth with fear. It was the controlling handles being pressed down, and the slight whistling noise of the water. Captain Stark had turned on the machine. The lamp was still on the iron floor of the press, and by its light I saw that the black ceiling was coming down on me – slowly and unsteadily, but with enough power to crush me into the floor. With a terrible cry I threw myself against the door and tore with my nails at the lock. I begged the Captain to let me out, but the sounds of the machinery drowned my cries. The ceiling was now only a foot or two above my head, and by raising my arm I could feel its hard rough surface. Then the thought struck me that the pain of my death would depend very much on the position of my body at the last moment. If I lay on my face the weight would come on my backbone, and I trembled to think of the terrible sound of my own back breaking. Perhaps it would be easier the other way – but had I enough courage to lie and look up at that fearful black shadow as it came nearer and nearer? Already I was unable to stand up, when I noticed something that brought hope back to my heart.

NP
‘I have said that though the floor and the ceiling were made of iron, the walls of the press were wooden. As I gave a last hopeless look around, I saw a thin line of yellow light between two of the boards; and this line became wider and wider as a small door was pushed backwards. For a moment I could hardly believe that here was a door that led away from death. The next moment I threw myself through, and lay half fainting on the other side. The door had closed again behind me, but the crash of the lamp as the ceiling struck it, and a few moments afterwards the sound of the top and bottom of the press meeting, made me realize what a narrow escape I had had.

‘Suddenly, as I lay outside the press, I felt somebody pulling at my wrist, and I saw that I was on the stone floor of a narrow passage, and a woman with an oil lamp in her hand was bending over me. It was the same good friend whose earlier warning I had so stupidly failed to take seriously.

“‘Come! Come!’ she cried. ‘They will be here in a moment. They will see that you are not there. Oh, do not waste valuable time, but come with me!’”

‘This time, at least, I took her advice. Unsteadily, I stood up, and ran with her along the passage and down a narrow staircase which led to another broad passage. Just as we reached this second passage, we heard the sound of running feet and the shouting of two voices – one answering the other – from the floor where we were, and from the one below. My guide stopped and looked around her as if she did not know what to do. Then she threw open a door which led into a bedroom, through the window of which the moon was shining brightly.

“‘It is your only chance,” she said. “The window is high up, but perhaps you can jump out.”

‘As she spoke a light appeared at the other end of the passage, and I saw the thin figure of Captain Stark rushing forward with a lamp in one hand, and an axe in the other. I rushed across the bedroom, threw open the window, and looked out. How quiet and pleasant the garden looked in the moonlight! It was about thirty feet down. I climbed out, but did not jump immediately, as I wanted to hear what was about to happen between Stark and the lady who had saved me from death. If it were necessary I was determined, whatever the risk, to return and help her. This thought had hardly flashed through my mind before he was at the door, pushing his way past her; but she threw her arms around him, and tried to hold him back.

“‘Fritz! Fritz! Remember your promise after the last time!’ she cried in English. “You said it would never happen again. He will not tell anyone! Oh, I am sure he will not!”

NP
“‘You are crazy, Elise!’ he shouted, struggling to free himself. “You will be the ruin of us. He has seen too much. Let me pass, I say!” He pushed her to one side, rushed to the window, and struck at me with his axe. At that moment I was hanging by my hands to the bottom of the window. I was conscious of a dull pain, and I fell into the garden below.

‘I was not hurt too much by the fall; so I got to my feet and rushed off among the bushes as fast as I could run – I knew that I was not out of danger yet. Suddenly, as I ran, I began to feel sick and faint. I looked down at my hand, which by now was really painful, and saw for the first time that my thumb had been cut off, and that blood was pouring from the wound. I attempted to tie a piece of cloth round it, but suddenly I seemed to hear a strange singing noise in my ears, and the next moment I fainted and fell.

'I do not know how long I remained unconscious. It must have been a very long time, as it was daybreak when I woke up. My clothes were wet through, and my coat was covered in blood from my wounded hand. The pain reminded me of all the details of my midnight adventure, and I jumped to my feet with the feeling that even now I might not be safe from my enemies. But, to my surprise, when I looked about me I could see neither the house nor the garden. I had been lying near the side of a country road, and not far off I saw a long low building. I walked along towards this, and found that it was the railway station where I had arrived the night before! Except for the wound on my hand, everything that had happened during those terrible hours might have been a dream.

'Still only half conscious, I went into the station, and asked about the morning train. There would be one to Reading in less than an hour. The same railwayman was on duty as at the time of my arrival. I asked him whether he had ever heard of Captain Lysander Stark. The name was not familiar to him. Had he noticed a carriage waiting for me the night before? No, he had not. Was there a police station anywhere near? There was one two or three miles away.

'It was too far for me to go, in my weak state. I decided to wait until I got back to London before telling my story to the police. It was about half past six when I arrived, and I went first to have my wound bandaged. After that, the doctor very kindly brought me along here. I should like to put the case into your hands, and will do exactly what you advise.'

NP Sherlock Holmes and I sat in silence for some moments after listening to this strange account. Then Holmes pulled down from a shelf one of the thick, heavy books in which it was his habit to stick pieces from the newspapers.

'Here is an advertisement that will interest you,' he said. 'It appeared in all the papers about a year ago. Listen to this: "Lost on the 9th of this month, Mr Jeremiah Hayling, twenty-six years old, an engineer. He left his rooms at ten o'clock at night, and has not been heard of since. He was dressed in . . ." and so on. Yes! That must have been the last time the Captain needed to have his press repaired, I think.'

'Good heavens!' cried my patient. 'Then that explains what the woman said.'

'I have no doubt of it,' said Holmes. 'It is quite clear that the Captain is a determined man, who would not allow anything or anybody to stand in his way. Well, every moment is important, and so, if you feel strong enough, Mr Hatherley, we will go to Scotland Yard* and then to Eyford.'

Two hours later we were all in the train together, on our way from Reading to the little Berkshire village. There were Sherlock Holmes, Mr Hatherley the engineer, Bradstreet the Scotland Yard detective, a young policeman, and myself. Bradstreet had spread a large-scale map of the Eyford area out on the seat, and was drawing a circle with Eyford at its centre.

'There!' he said. 'That circle is twenty miles across – ten miles from Eyford in every direction. The place we want must be somewhere near that line. You said ten miles, I think, sir?'

'The drive took more than an hour,' said Mr Hatherley.

'And you think that they brought you back all that way while you were unconscious?'

'They must have done so. I have a confused memory, too, of having been lifted and carried somewhere.'

'I can't understand why they didn't kill you when they found you in the garden,' I said. 'Perhaps the woman begged Stark to let

* Scotland Yard: the main office of London's police detectives.

you go, and succeeded in softening him.'

'I don't think that very likely,' Hatherley answered, 'I never saw a more cruel face than his in my life.'

'Oh, we shall soon find an explanation for all that,' said Bradstreet. 'Well, I have drawn my circle, but I wish I knew at which point on it the wanted men are to be found.'

'I think I could put my finger on the right point,' said Holmes quietly.

'Really?' cried Bradstreet. 'So you have formed your opinion? Well, then, we shall see who agrees with you. I say it is to the south, as there are very few houses in that direction.'

'And I say east,' said Hatherley.

'I think it is to the west,' said the second policeman. 'There are several quiet little villages up there.'

'And I think it is to the north,' I said, 'because there are no hills there, and Mr Hatherley says that he did not notice the carriage going up any.'

Bradstreet laughed. 'So we have opinions for north, south, east, and west. Which do you agree with, Mr Holmes?'

'I don't agree with any of them,' Holmes answered.

'But we can't all be wrong!'

'Oh, yes, you can! This is my point,' he said, placing his finger on the centre of the circle. 'This is where we shall find them.'

'But how do you explain the ten-mile drive?' asked Hatherley in surprise.

'Five miles out and five back. Nothing could be simpler. You said yourself that the horse was quite fresh when you got in. That would be completely impossible if the horse had just gone ten miles over rough roads.'

'Yes,' said Bradstreet thoughtfully. 'It's quite a likely explanation. Of course it is not difficult to guess what kind of men these are.'

'Yes,' said Holmes. 'They are forgers of coins on a large scale.'

The press is used to form the mixture with which they make a metal that looks like silver.'

'We have known for some time that a clever group was at work,' said Bradstreet. 'They have made many thousands of forged silver coins. We even had clues which led to Reading. But we could get no further – they had covered their tracks too cleverly. But now I think they are about to fall into our hands.'

But Bradstreet was mistaken. Those criminals never fell into the hands of the police. As our train came into Eyford Station, we saw a broad line of smoke rising into the air behind some trees in the neighbourhood of the village.

'Is there a house on fire?' Bradstreet asked, as soon as we had got out.

'Yes, sir,' said the stationmaster.

'When did the fire break out?'

'I hear that it was during the night, sir, but it has got worse, and by now the house is almost completely destroyed.'

'Whose house is it?'

'Dr Becher's.'

'Tell me,' Hatherley interrupted, 'is Dr Becher a German, very thin, with a long sharp nose?'

The stationmaster laughed loudly. 'No, sir, Dr Becher is an Englishman, and he's the fattest man in the village. But he has a gentleman staying with him – one of his patients, I believe – who is a foreigner, and he is extremely thin.'

The stationmaster had not finished speaking before we were all hurrying in the direction of the fire. In front of us on a low hill there was a large white house. Smoke and flames were coming out of every window, while in the garden in front three fire engines were attempting, with little success, to control the fire.

'That's the house!' cried Hatherley in great excitement. 'There are the bushes where I lay, and that second window is the one that I jumped from.'

'Well, at least,' said Holmes, 'you have had your revenge on them. I have no doubt that it was your oil lamp which, when it was crushed in the press, set fire to the wooden walls – though no doubt Stark and Ferguson were too excited by their hunt for you to notice it at the time. Now keep your eyes open in this crowd for those two men – though I fear that by now they are almost at the other end of England.'

And Holmes was right in his guess. From that day to this nothing has ever been heard of the beautiful woman, the cruel German, or the bad-tempered, silent Englishman. Early that morning a farmer had met a cart containing several people and some very large boxes. They were driving fast in the direction of Reading. But the criminals left no further signs, and even Holmes failed to discover any clues.

We learnt that the firemen had found a human thumb, recently cut off, at a window on the second floor of the house. At about sunset they succeeded in putting the fire out, but by that time the roof had fallen in, and almost nothing remained of the forgers' machinery inside the house. Large amounts of different metals were found in a building behind the house, but it was clear that the criminals had taken their stores of forged coins away with them in the boxes.

The mystery of how Mr Hatherley had been carried from the garden to the roadside was quickly solved when Holmes found a double line of footprints in the soft earth. The engineer had been carried out by two people, one of whom had very small feet, and the other unusually large ones. On the whole, it was most likely that the silent Englishman – less fearless or less cruel than the German captain – had helped the woman to carry the unconscious man out of the way of danger.

'Well,' said Hatherley a little sadly, 'it has been a strange affair for me! I have lost my thumb, and I have lost fifty pounds in pay, and what have I gained?'

'You have gained experience,' said Holmes, laughing. 'And you have now got a true and interesting story of your own, which you will be able to tell every day for the rest of your life!'

The Patient

One October evening Sherlock Holmes and I were returning to our rooms in Baker Street after a long walk. I had been sharing rooms with Holmes since the death of my wife in 1894. It was quite late in the evening, but there was a carriage outside the house.

A gentleman was waiting for us in our sitting room. He stood up when we came in. He was about thirty-three or thirty-four years old, with thin, artist's hands, and looked unhealthy and tired. He was dressed completely in black.

'Good evening,' Holmes said to him cheerfully. 'Please sit down again! What can I do to help you?'

'My name is Dr Percy Trevelyan,' said our visitor, 'and I live at 403 Brook Street.'

'You have written a book on catalepsy, haven't you?' I asked. Dr Trevelyan was very pleased and proud that I knew his book. His pale face became quite red.

'I thought that the book had been completely forgotten!' he said. 'Very few copies were sold. I suppose you are a doctor yourself, sir?'

'I used to be an army doctor,' I replied, 'and after that I was in private practice for a few years.'

'My own special interest has always been catalepsy,' he said. 'I would like to work more on that disease. But one must take what one can get! I must not talk too much about my own interests, though! I realize that your time is valuable, Mr Holmes. Well, some very strange things have been happening recently at the house in Brook Street, and tonight they have reached such a point that I felt that I had to come and ask for your advice and your help.'

Sherlock Holmes sat down and lit his pipe. 'You are very welcome to both!' he said. 'Please give me a complete account of the things that are worrying you. Tell me all the details.'

'Some of them are very unimportant,' said Dr Trevelyan. 'But the affair is so difficult to understand that I will tell you the whole story.'

'I am a London University man. I won several prizes at the University, and my teachers thought that I would become a very successful doctor. I continued my studies afterwards, worked at King's College Hospital, and wrote my book on catalepsy. But, gentlemen, I had no money. A man who wants to become a specialist must live in the expensive area round Cavendish Square – there are only about twelve possible streets, and the rents are extremely high! One also has to hire a horse and carriage, and buy furniture for one's house. I would have needed ten years to be able to save the necessary money. But suddenly I had a great surprise.'

'A stranger came to see me one day in my room at King's College Hospital. This gentleman's name was Blessington.'

'“Are you the man who has won so many prizes?” he asked.'

'“Yes, I am,” I said, shaking his hand.'

'“I want to ask you some questions,” he said. “First of all, have you any bad habits? Do you drink too much?”'

'“Really, sir!” I cried.'

'“Please don't be angry” he said. “I had to ask you that question. Why are you not working as a private specialist? I suppose you haven't enough money? I will help you! I will rent a house for you in Brook Street.”'

'I must have looked as surprised as I felt.'

'“Oh, I'm making you this offer to help me, not just you!” he said. “I will be honest with you. I have a few thousand pounds that I am not using. I want to use it to help you to establish a private practice.”'

"But why?" I asked him.

"Because I want my money to grow!" he replied.

"What must I do, then?" I asked.

"I just want you to do your job," he said. "I will buy the furniture for your house, pay the rent, and pay all your costs each week. You can keep a quarter of the money you earn. You will give me the other three-quarters."

'It was a strange offer, Mr Holmes, but I accepted it. A few weeks later I moved into the house in Brook Street. Mr Blessington came to live there too. He said that his heart was weak: he needed to live near a doctor. He turned the best two rooms into a bedroom and a sitting room for himself. He had strange habits. He seemed to have no friends, and very rarely went out.

'Regularly every evening, he came into my consulting room to find out how much I had earned. He then took all the money and gave me back exactly a quarter of it. The rest of the money he kept in the strongbox in his bedroom.

'I have been very successful as a specialist, Mr Holmes, and in the last year or two I have made him a rich man.

'A few weeks ago Mr Blessington came down to speak to me. He mentioned a recent London robbery. He seemed to be surprisingly worried and anxious, and he wanted to get stronger locks put on our doors and windows.

'He remained in this strange state of anxiety for a week. He never stopped looking out of the window and did not go out at all. He seemed to be living in terrible fear of something or of somebody, but when I asked him about this he answered me very rudely. Then, slowly, he seemed to forget his fears.

'A recent event, though, has brought all his fears back again. Two days ago I received a letter, which I will read to you. There is no address or date on it.

Dear Dr Trevelyan,

I am a Russian lord, but I now live in England. For some years I have been suffering from catalepsy. As you are a great and well-known brain specialist, I would like to consult you.

I will call on you at about a quarter past six tomorrow evening and hope that is convenient for you.

NP

'Of course I was waiting in my consulting room at that time the following evening because catalepsy is a rare disease and I was extremely interested.

'The Russian was a thin old man who did not look very much like a lord. There was a young man with him. He was tall and good-looking, with a dark, strong face and very powerful arms and chest. He gently supported the old man with a hand under his arm as they entered. Then he helped him to sit down.

"Please forgive me for coming in with my father, doctor," said this young man. His voice was that of a foreigner.

"That is quite all right," I replied. "Would you like to stay with your father while I examine him?"

"No, thank you," he answered. "I will go back into the waiting room."

'Then the young man went out, and I turned to the older man to begin discussing his illness. He did not seem very intelligent, and he did not speak English very well – so it was difficult.

'Suddenly, he stopped answering my questions. I saw that he was sitting very stiffly, and looking at me with strange, empty eyes. He was in a state of catalepsy. Of course, as a professional, I was excited. I examined him very carefully, and took notes on his condition. He seemed to be in exactly the same state as other people who have the illness.

'I decided to treat him with some medicine that I believed to be helpful to such conditions. The bottle was in my storeroom, which is behind the consulting room, so I went out to get it. Unfortunately it took me five minutes to find the bottle. Then I went back into my consulting room. Mr Holmes, the old man was not there!

'The waiting room was empty too. The servants had heard nothing. Mr Blessington, who had been out for a short walk, came in soon afterwards, but I did not tell him about the strange disappearance of my Russian patient.

'Well, I did not think the Russians would ever come back. But this evening, again at a quarter past six, they both came into my office.

'“I am very sorry that I left so suddenly yesterday, Doctor,” said the old man.

'“I was certainly surprised!” I replied.

'“I can explain it,” he said. “When my catalepsy goes away, my mind is always empty. I do not remember what has been happening. Yesterday I woke up, confused, in a strange room. I did not know where I was. So I simply got up and walked out into the street.”

'“And when I saw my father come out of your consulting room,” said the son, “I thought that the examination was over. I did not realize what had really happened until we had reached home.”

'“Well,” I said, laughing, “I understand everything now.” I turned to the older man. “I will continue the examination now, sir, if you wish.”

'For about half an hour I discussed the old gentleman's illness with him, and gave him the best advice I could. Then he and his son went away.

'Mr Blessington, who often went for a walk at that time of day, came in soon afterwards and went up to his rooms. A moment later I heard him running down again, and he rushed into my consulting room. He seemed to be almost crazy with fear.

'“Who has been in my rooms?” he cried.

'“No one,” I said.

'“That is a lie!” he shouted. “Come up and look.”

'I went up with him, and he pointed to several footprints on the floor.

'“Those are certainly not the marks of my feet!” Mr Blessington said.

'They were much larger, and seemed to be quite fresh. As you know, it rained hard this afternoon, and the two Russians were my only visitors.

'The younger man must have gone up to Mr Blessington's room. But why? Nothing at all was missing.

'I was shocked to see that Mr Blessington was crying. He could hardly speak, but he mentioned your name, and of course I came here immediately. He will be so grateful if you can come back with me now, in my carriage.'

Holmes said nothing. He simply gave me my hat, picked up his own, and followed Dr Trevelyan out of the room.

A quarter of an hour later we arrived at the house in Brook Street. A servant let us in, but suddenly somebody turned off the light in the hall.

We heard the person say in a frightened voice: 'I have a gun! If you come any nearer I will shoot you.'

'This is very stupid behaviour, Mr Blessington!' cried the doctor angrily.

'Oh, it is you, Doctor!' said the voice. 'But who are these other gentlemen?' He lit the gas light again and examined us carefully. He was a very fat man, but had once been much fatter: the skin hung loosely on his face, which looked very unhealthy. He had thin red hair.

At last he put his gun back into his pocket and said: 'It's all right now. You may come up. I hope I have not upset you. How do you do, Mr Holmes. You must advise me! I suppose that Dr Trevelyan has told you what has happened?’

‘Yes, he has,’ said Holmes. ‘Who are these two strangers, Mr Blessington, and why are they your enemies?’

‘I really don’t know!’ the fat man answered. ‘But please come up to my rooms.’

We went with him into his bedroom. It was large and comfortable. Pointing to a big black box at the end of the bed, Mr Blessington said: ‘I have never been a very rich man, Mr Holmes. And I don’t like banks. I don’t trust them! All my money is in that box, so of course I am very worried about this whole affair.’

Holmes looked at Blessington in his strange way, and then shook his head.

‘I cannot possibly advise you if you try to deceive me,’ he said.

‘But I have told you everything!’ said Blessington.

Holmes turned away.

‘Good night, Dr Trevelyan,’ he said.

‘But aren’t you going to give me any advice?’ cried Blessington.

‘My advice to you, sir,’ Holmes replied, ‘is to tell the truth.’ A minute later we were on our way home. As we walked down Harley Street, Holmes said: ‘I am sorry we have wasted our time this evening, Watson. This Brook Street affair is rather interesting, though.’

‘I don’t understand it at all,’ I admitted.

‘Well, those two men intend to harm Blessington for some reason. The young man went up to Blessington’s rooms on both days, I am sure. By chance Blessington was out.’

‘But Dr Trevelyan thought the old man really had catalepsy!’ I said.

‘It is not difficult to pretend to have catalepsy. I have done it myself.’

‘Why did the men choose such an unusual time of day?’

‘Because there must be nobody else in the waiting room.’

Watson, it is easy to see that Blessington is frightened for his life. And of course he knows who these two terrible enemies are. Perhaps tomorrow he will stop telling me lies.’

Holmes woke me up at half past seven the next morning.

‘There is a carriage waiting for us, Watson,’ he said.

‘What is the matter?’ I asked him.

‘I have had a note from Dr Trevelyan. In it he says: “Come immediately!” – and nothing else.’

Twenty minutes later we were back at the doctor’s house. He came running out to meet us. His face was very pale.

‘Oh, it’s terrible!’ he cried.

‘What has happened?’ we asked.

‘Blessington has killed himself.’

Holmes whistled.

‘Yes,’ Dr Trevelyan continued, ‘he hanged himself during the night.’

We went in with him. He took us into the waiting room.

‘The police are already up there,’ he said. ‘This death has been a terrible shock to me.’

‘When was he found?’ Holmes asked.

‘One of the servants takes him a cup of tea at seven o’clock every morning. When she went into his bedroom this morning she saw the poor man hanging in the middle of the room. He had tied a rope to the hook on which the lamp usually hangs. And he had jumped off the top of his strongbox – the one he showed us yesterday!’

After thinking for a moment, Holmes said: ‘I would like to go up now.’

We all went up to Blessington’s bedroom.

The body looked hardly human. A police officer was beside it, writing in his notebook.

'Ah, Mr Holmes!' he said. 'I am very glad to see you.'

'Good morning, Lanner,' Holmes said. 'Have you heard all about the events of the last few days?'

'Yes.'

'And what is your opinion of the affair?'

'I think that fear had made Mr Blessington crazy. He went to bed – his bed has been slept in, as you can see. Then at about five o'clock he got up and hanged himself.'

I felt the body.

'Yes, he does seem to have been dead for about three hours,' I said.

'Have you found anything unusual in the room?' Holmes asked the police officer.

'Well, sir, Mr Blessington seems to have smoked a lot during the night. I found these four cigar ends in the fireplace.'

Holmes looked at them.

'And have you found Blessington's cigar holder?'

'No. I haven't seen one.'

'And where is his cigar case?'

'Here it is. I found it in his coat pocket.'

Holmes opened it and smelt the one cigar which it contained.

'Oh, this is a Cuban cigar,' he said. 'These others are Dutch.' He examined them in detail. 'Two of these were smoked through a cigar holder. The other two were not. Two were cut by a knife that was not very sharp, and the other two were bitten – by a person with excellent teeth. Mr Blessington did not kill himself. He was murdered.'

'That is impossible!' cried Lanner.

'Why?'

'Murderers never hang people! And in any case, how did they get in?'

'Through the front door.'

'It was barred this morning.'

'Because someone inside the house barred it. In a moment I will tell you how this murder was done.'

He went over to the door and examined the lock on the bedroom door. Then he took out the key and examined that too; next he looked at the bed, the floor, the chairs, the dead body, and the rope. At last he told us that he was satisfied, and we cut the rope and laid the body gently on the bed. We covered it with a sheet.

'Where did the rope come from?' Holmes asked.

'It was cut off this longer one,' said Dr Trevelyan. He showed us a rope under the bed. 'He was terribly afraid of fire. He always kept this rope near him, so that he could climb down from the window if the stairs caught fire.'

'Yes, all the facts are now very clear,' Holmes said. 'I hope that I shall soon be able to tell you the reasons for them as well. I will borrow this photograph of Blessington, as it may help me in my inquiries.'

'But you haven't told us anything!' cried Dr Trevelyan.

'Oh, there were two murderers – the men who pretended to be Russian lords – and they were helped by one of your own servants.'

'My man has certainly disappeared,' said the doctor.

'He let the murderers into the house,' Holmes went on. 'Mr Blessington's door was locked, but they turned the key with a strong piece of wire. You can see the marks quite clearly.'

'They must have tied something over Mr Blessington's mouth, to prevent him from crying out. Then they held a trial in which they themselves were the judges. That was when they smoked cigars.'

'When it was over, they took Blessington and hanged him. Then they left. The servant barred the front door after they had gone.'

Lanner hurried away to try to find the servant. Holmes and I

NP returned to Baker Street for breakfast.

'I shall be back by three o'clock,' Holmes said when we had finished our meal. 'Lanner and Dr Trevelyan will meet me here then.'

The police officer and the doctor arrived at three, but Holmes did not join us until a quarter to four. But I could see that he was cheerful.

'Have you any news, Lanner?' he asked.

'We have caught the servant, sir,' Lanner replied.

'Excellent! And I have discovered who the murderers are. Their names are Biddle and Hayward.'

'The Worthingdon Bank robbers!' cried Lanner.

'Yes. And the man who used the name 'Blessington' was another of them.'

'So his real name must have been Sutton. Everything is clear now!' said Lanner.

But Trevelyan and I still did not understand.

'Have you forgotten the great Worthingdon Bank robbery?' said Holmes. 'There were four robbers – Biddle, Hayward, Sutton, and a man called Cartwright. A night watchman was killed, and the thieves got away with seven thousand pounds. That was fifteen years ago. When the case came to court there was not much proof against the robbers, but this man Blessington (that is, Sutton) decided to help the police. The result was that Cartwright was hanged, and Biddle and Hayward were sent to prison for fifteen years. When they were let out, they decided to punish Sutton (that is, Blessington) for what he had done.'

Nobody was punished for Blessington's death. Biddle and Hayward were drowned soon afterwards when a steamer called the Norah Creina sank off the coast of Portugal. And there was not enough proof against Dr Trevelyan's servant, so he was never charged. No complete account of the Brook Street mystery has ever been given to the public until now.

The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax

'Turkish, Watson?' asked Sherlock Holmes, looking at my shoes.

'No, they are English, of course!' I answered. 'I bought them here in London, at Latimer's in Oxford Street.'

Holmes smiled.

'I was not talking about your shoes, Watson,' he said. 'I was talking about the bath! You have had a Turkish bath today, haven't you?'

'Yes, I have. But how did you know that, Holmes?'

'My dear Watson, I looked at your shoes.'

'Perhaps I am a little slow,' I said, 'but I don't understand how a pair of English shoes and a Turkish bath can be connected! Won't you explain?'

'It is very simple,' he said. 'You are in the habit of tying your shoes in a particular way. But today they are tied with a beautiful double knot. So it is clear that you have taken them off. And somebody else has tied them for you. Who was this person? A man in a shoe shop? No. You bought some new shoes only a week ago. It was not a man in a shoe shop. It was the servant at the Turkish bath. It is simple, isn't it? And why, Watson, did you go to the Turkish bath?'

'Because I have been feeling old and ill for the last few days. A Turkish bath usually makes me feel well again.'

'You need a change, Watson. I suggest Switzerland. Would you like to stay at the best hotel in Lausanne? You would live like a king, and it would be completely free! And of course you would travel first class on the train.'

'That would be wonderful,' I said. 'But why are you offering me an opportunity like this?'

Holmes did not answer. Instead, he leaned back in his chair and took his notebook from his pocket.

'Unmarried women who wander around the world from one hotel to another put themselves in great danger from evil people. If such a lady disappears, nobody misses her. I very much fear that some terrible harm has come to Lady Frances Carfax,' he said finally.

'Lady Frances,' he continued, 'is the last member of her direct family. Her father and her brothers are all dead but the family fortune followed the male line. She is not a rich woman, but she has some fine old Spanish silver jewellery, and some very unusual and beautiful diamonds. She loves this jewellery so much that she has always refused to leave it at her bank for safety. So she carries her diamonds with her wherever she goes. I feel sorry for Lady Frances Carfax, Watson. She is still quite young and beautiful, but she is completely alone in the world.'

'And what has happened to her?' I asked.

'Ah, Watson, that is the mystery we have to solve! I don't even know whether she is alive or dead. She is a lady of very regular habits, and for the last four years she has written a letter every two weeks to her old nurse. The nurse, whose name is Miss Dobney, lives in Camberwell, here in London. It is Miss Dobney who has asked for my help. Lady Frances has not written to her for nearly five weeks. Her last letter came from the National Hotel in Lausanne. The manager of the hotel says that the lady left without telling anybody her new address. Miss Dobney is very anxious about her, and so are Lady Frances's rich cousins. We shall not run short of money, Watson!'

'Is Miss Dobney the only person Lady Frances writes to here in England?'

'No. There is also the manager of her bank. I have talked to him. He showed me her used cheques, and there were two recent ones. The first was for a very large amount, much more than enough to pay her hotel bill. The second cheque was for fifty pounds, and was made out to Miss Marie Devine. The money was paid to Miss Devine less than three weeks ago, at a bank in Montpellier in the south of France.'

'And who is Miss Marie Devine?' I asked.

'I have already found that out,' Holmes answered. 'She was Lady Frances's maid. I have not yet found out why Lady Frances gave her that cheque. But I have no doubt that you will be able to discover the reason.'

'I, Holmes!'

'Yes, Watson. That was why I suggested a holiday in Switzerland. You know that I cannot possibly leave London just now. The London police would feel lonely if I went abroad! So you must go, Watson. Send me a telegram if you need my advice.'

Two days later I was at the National Hotel in Lausanne. The manager, Mr Moser, told me that Lady Frances had stayed there for several weeks. Everyone who met her had liked her very much. She was not more than forty years old. Mr Moser did not know that she had any valuable jewellery, but the servants had noticed that there was one large heavy box that was always locked. Marie Devine was as popular as Lady Frances herself; in fact she was going to marry one of the waiters at the hotel, so I had no difficulty in getting her address. It was 11 rue de Trajan Montpellier, France. I wrote all this down in a little notebook. I was proud of my cleverness: Holmes himself could not have collected more facts!

But the biggest mystery still remained. What was the reason for Lady Frances's sudden decision to leave? She was very happy in Lausanne; everyone had expected her to stay for several months. She had had lovely rooms with a view of Lake Geneva. But she had left so suddenly! She had even paid a week's rent for nothing! Mr Moser could not understand it. Only Jules Vibart, the waiter who was going to marry Marie Devine, was able to give me any useful information. A day or two before Lady Frances left, a tall, dark man with a beard had visited the hotel, the sort of man that you would think twice before offending.

'He looked like a wild animal!' cried Jules Vibart.

The man had rooms somewhere in the town, and Vibart and Marie had seen him by the lake with Lady Frances, talking very earnestly to her. The next time the man came to the hotel, though, Lady Frances had refused to see him. He was English, but Vibart did not know his name. Lady Frances had left Lausanne immediately afterwards. Vibart and Marie both thought that the strange Englishman's visit was the cause of Lady Frances's decision to leave.

I asked Vibart why Marie had left her post, but he refused to answer.

'I cannot tell you that, sir,' he said. 'If you want to find out, you must go to Montpellier and ask Marie herself.'

After my conversations with Mr Moser and Vibart, I tried to find out where Lady Frances had travelled to from Lausanne. Perhaps Lady Frances had been trying to escape from someone? Certainly it was strange that her cases and boxes had not been clearly marked. She had, though, reached Baden-Baden in Germany after a very long and indirect journey. I found this out from one of the local travel companies.

I therefore bought a ticket to Baden-Baden myself. Before I left Lausanne I sent Holmes a telegram, giving him an account of everything I had done. In his reply he said that he was proud of me, but I did not know whether he was joking or serious.

At Baden-Baden I was told that Lady Frances had stayed at the English Hotel for two weeks. At the hotel she had met a man called Dr Schlessinger and his wife. Dr Schlessinger was a religious man who had been working in South America, where he had fallen ill.

Lady Frances herself was a very religious woman, and for her it was an honour to know such a man. She gladly helped Mrs Schlessinger to look after him, and he used to sit all day outside the hotel with one of the ladies on each side of him, reading and writing on religious matters.

Finally, when Dr Schlessinger's health had improved a little, he and his wife had returned to London. Lady Frances had gone with them, and Dr Schlessinger had paid her hotel bill. It was now three weeks since they had left.

I asked the manager about Marie Devine, Lady Frances's maid.

'She left a few days before the Schlessingers and Lady Frances went to England,' he answered. 'She was crying bitterly, and she told me that she never wanted to work as a servant again.'

The manager went on, after a pause:

'You are not the first person who has asked for information about Lady Frances Carfax. About a week ago another Englishman came here asking questions about her.'

'Did he tell you his name?' I asked.

'No. He was a very strange man!'

'Did he look like a wild animal?' I was thinking of what Jules Vibart had told me in Lausanne.

'Yes! A wild animal,' said the manager. 'That is a perfect description of him. He was a large man with a sunburnt face and a beard. I would not like to be his enemy!' Already the solution to the mystery was becoming clear. This evil, cruel man was chasing the poor lady from place to place. It was obvious that she was terribly afraid of him, otherwise she would not have left Lausanne. And now he had followed her as far as Baden-Baden. Sooner or later he would catch up with her! Had he already caught up with her, perhaps? Was that the explanation for her disappearance?

I just hoped that the good Dr Schlessinger and his wife would be able to protect her from this evil man.

In another telegram to Holmes I told him that I had discovered who was to blame for her continuing disappearance. But instead of a reply I received this:

DESCRIBE DR. SCHLESSINGER'S LEFT EAR, PLEASE. HOLMES.

Holmes's little joke did not amuse me. In fact I was rather annoyed by it.

Next I went to Montpellier to see Marie Devine. She was very helpful. She had been fond of Lady Frances and completely loyal to her, she said, but recently Lady Frances had not been kind to her, and had even once accused her of stealing.

I asked her about the cheque for fifty pounds.

'It was a present, sir,' she replied. 'I am going to be married soon.'

We then spoke of the strange Englishman.

'Ah, he is a bad man, sir!' said Marie. 'A violent man. I myself have seen him seize Lady Frances by the wrist, and hurt her. It was by the lake at Lausanne, sir.'

Marie was sure that fear of this man was the cause of Lady Frances's sudden journeys. The poor lady was trying to escape from him.

'But look, sir!' Marie suddenly said. 'He's out there – the man himself!' She sounded frightened.

I looked out of the window. A very tall, dark man with a large black beard was walking slowly down the centre of the street, looking up at the numbers of the houses. It was clear that, like myself, he was looking for Marie. I ran out of the house and spoke to him angrily.

'You are an Englishman,' I said.

'I don't want to speak to you,' he said rudely.

'May I ask what your name is?'

'No, you may not!' he answered.

It was a difficult situation. The only way to deal with it was to use the direct method of shock.

'Where is Lady Frances Carfax?' I asked.

He looked at me in surprise.

'What have you done with her?' I continued. 'Why have you been following her? I want an answer from you immediately!'

The man gave a shout of anger and jumped on me. I am not a weak man, but he was as strong as a horse. He fought like a devil, and soon his hands were round my throat. I was nearly unconscious when a French workman rushed out of a small hotel and saved me. He struck the Englishman on the arm with his stick: this made him loosen his hold on my throat. The wild man then stood near us for a moment, unable to decide whether to attack me again. Finally he turned angrily away and went into the house where Marie lived. I began to thank the kind Frenchman beside me.

'Well, Watson,' the "Frenchman" said, 'you haven't done very well this time! I think you had better come back with me to London by the night train.'

An hour later Sherlock Holmes, wearing his own clothes now, was with me in my private sitting room at my hotel.

'I did not expect to be able to get away from London,' he said, 'but here I am after all!'

'And how did you know that I would be here in Montpellier?' I asked him.

'It was easy to guess that Montpellier would be the next stage of your travels,' Holmes said. 'Since I arrived I have been sitting in that small hotel, waiting for you. And really, Watson, what a situation you have got into!'

'Perhaps you would not have done any better yourself,' I answered, annoyed.

'I have done better, Watson!'

Just then one of the hotel servants brought somebody's card in. Holmes looked at it.

'Ah, here is Mr Philip Green. Mr Green is staying at this hotel, and he may be able to help us to find out what has happened to Lady Frances Carfax.'

NP The man who came in was the same violent person who had attacked me in the street. He did not look pleased when he saw me.

'I received your letter, Mr Holmes,' he said. 'But why is this man here? In what way can he be connected with the affair?'

'This is my old friend Dr Watson,' replied Holmes. 'He is helping us in this case.'

The stranger held out his large brown hand.

'I am very sorry about what happened, Dr Watson,' he said. 'When you blamed me for hurting Frances I lost all my self-control. I am in a terrible state, you know. I don't understand this affair at all. And, Mr Holmes, I don't even know who told you of my existence!'

'I have spoken to Miss Dobney, Lady Frances's old nurse,' Holmes said.

'Old Susan Dobney with the funny hat!' said Green. 'I remember her well.'

'And she remembers you. She knew you in the days before you went to South Africa.'

'Ah, I see that you know my whole story. I will not hide anything from you, Mr Holmes. I have loved Frances all my life. When I was a young man I made a few mistakes and got into trouble. And she was always so pure and good! So when somebody told her how I was living, she refused to speak to me again. But she certainly loved me. She loved me well enough to remain single. I stayed in South Africa for many years, and I became rich there. When I came back to Europe, I decided to find her – to try to persuade her to marry me. I found her in Lausanne, and I think I almost persuaded her, but her will was strong. The next time I went to her hotel I was told that she had left town. I tracked her as far as Baden-Baden, and then after a time I learned that her servant was here. I am a rough sort of person; I have had a rough sort of life, and when Doctor Watson spoke to me as he did I became quite wild for a moment. But, Mr Holmes, tell me what has happened to Lady Frances!'

'We will do our best to find that out,' said Holmes in a serious voice. 'What is your address in London, Mr Green?'

'You can send letters or messages to the Langham Hotel.'

'I think you should return to London,' Holmes said. 'I may need you. I promise you that everything possible will be done for the safety of Lady Frances. Here is my card with my address on it. Now, Watson, while you are packing your bag, I will send a telegram to Mrs Hudson. I will ask her to prepare a good dinner for two hungry travellers at half past seven tomorrow evening.'

At home the following evening, we found a telegram for Holmes on our table.

'TORN, FROM INJURY' was the message, which came from Baden-Baden.

'What does this mean?' I asked.

'It is the answer to a question about Dr Schlessinger's ear. You may remember my telegram. You did not answer it.'

'I thought it was a joke.'

'Really? Well, I sent the same message to the manager of the English Hotel. This telegram is his answer. An important answer, Watson – very important!'

'What does it prove?'

'It proves, my dear Watson, that we are dealing with a clever and dangerous man. His name is Henry Peters, or 'Peters the Priest', from Adelaide in Australia. He is one of the most evil men in the world, Watson. He is specially skilful at robbing lonely ladies by making use of their religious feelings. He is helped in this by a friend of his, a woman called Annie Fraser, who pretends to be his wife. I suspected that "Dr Schlessinger" was really Mr Peters. The matter of the torn ear makes it quite certain.'

'And how did Peters the Priest get his torn ear?' I asked.

'He was hurt in a fight at an Adelaide hotel,' Holmes replied. 'It happened about six years ago. Well, Watson, poor Lady Frances is in the hands of a terrible pair. Perhaps she is already dead. In fact that is quite likely. If she is still alive, she is certainly a prisoner somewhere. She is unable to write letters to Miss Dobney or to anybody else. I believe that Lady Frances is here in London, where it is easy to keep a person a prisoner in complete secrecy. After dinner I will go along to Scotland Yard and speak to our friend Lestrade.'

But the police did not manage to discover anything. The three people we wanted to find had completely disappeared. We advertised in the newspapers, but that failed. The police watched all Peters the Priest's old friends, but he did not visit them. And then, suddenly, after a week of waiting, something happened. A piece of old Spanish jewellery, made of silver and diamonds, had been received by a pawnbroker in Westminster Road. The man who brought it in was a large man who looked like a priest, and gave a name and address which were clearly false. The pawnbroker had not noticed his ear, but we were sure that the description was that of Peters the Priest.

Philip Green had already come to see us twice, anxiously hoping for news. The third time he came, we were able to tell him something at last.

'Peters has taken some of Lady Frances's jewellery to a pawnbroker's shop,' Holmes told him. 'We are going to catch him now.'

'But does this mean that any harm has come to Lady Frances?' asked Green.

Holmes gave him a very serious look. 'If Peters and Annie Fraser have kept her a prisoner until now, they cannot set her free without danger to themselves. I fear the worst, Mr Green.'

'Please give me something to do, Mr Holmes!' said Green.

'Do these people know you?' asked Holmes.

'No.'

'Peters will probably go back to the same pawnbroker's when he needs money again. I will give you a letter to the pawnbroker, and he will let you wait in the shop. If Peters comes in, you must follow him home. But you must not let him see you. And of course you must not attack him. Please do nothing without telling me.'

For two days Green brought us no news. Then, on the evening of the third day, he rushed into our sitting room, pale and trembling with excitement.

'We have caught him!' he cried. 'We have caught him!'

He was so excited that he could hardly speak. Holmes pushed him into an armchair.

'Please, Mr Green,' he said, 'tell us what has happened.'

'She came into the shop an hour ago. It was the wife this time, but the piece of jewellery she brought was just like the other. She is a tall, pale woman, with eyes like a rat's.'

'That is the woman,' said Holmes.

'She left the shop and I followed her. She walked up Kennington Road. Then she went into another shop. Mr Holmes, it was an undertaker's!'

I could see the shock on Holmes's face.

'Go on,' he said, forcing himself to speak calmly.

'I went in too,' said Green. 'She was talking to the undertaker inside. I heard her say: 'It is late.' The undertaker replied: 'It has probably arrived by now. It took longer than an ordinary one would take.' Then they both stopped and looked at me. So I asked the undertaker the way to Waterloo Station and then left the shop.'

'You have done well, Mr Green,' said Holmes. 'Very well! And what happened next?'

'The woman came out. I had hidden in the doorway of another shop. I think she was suspicious of me, because I saw her looking round for me. Then she called a carriage and got in. I managed to get another and so to follow hers. She got out at 36 Poultny Square, in Brixton. I drove past, left the carriage at the corner of the square, and watched the house.'

'Did you see anyone?' asked Holmes.

'There was only one light on, in a window on the ground floor. I could not see in. I was standing there, wondering what to do next, when a cart stopped outside the house. Two men got out, took something out of the cart, and carried it up the steps to the front door. Mr Holmes, it was a coffin!'

'Ah!'

'For a moment I thought of rushing into the house. The door had been opened to let in the men with the coffin. It was the woman who had opened it. But as I stood there, she saw me. I think she recognized me. I saw her face change, and she closed the door immediately. I remembered my promise to you, and here I am.'

'You have done excellent work,' said Holmes. He wrote a few words on a half-sheet of paper. 'Please take this note to Mr Lestrade at Scotland Yard. We need to search the place and he will arrange everything. There may be some difficulty, but the matter of the jewellery is good enough proof of some crime, I think.'

'But Frances may be murdered before then!' said Green. 'That coffin must surely be for her.'

'We will do everything that can be done, Mr Green. We will not waste any time. Now, Watson,' he said, as Green hurried away, 'to me the situation seems so terrible that we must act now, without the help of the law. You and I are the unofficial police of London. We must go to Poultny Square immediately.'

When we were in the carriage, travelling at high speed over Westminster Bridge, Holmes gave me his views on Peters the Priest's plans.

'These evil people have persuaded this poor lady to dismiss her servant and to come to London with them. If she has written any letters, they have been stolen and destroyed. The criminals have rented a house. They have made her a prisoner, and now they have taken possession of her jewellery, the original reason for their interest in Lady Frances. Already they have begun to get money for it from the pawnbroker. They do not know that she has friends who are tracking them. They cannot set her free, and they cannot keep her a prisoner for ever. So they must kill her.'

'That seems very clear,' I said.

'And the arrival of the coffin proves, I fear, that she is already dead. Oh, Watson, there is the undertaker's, I think. Stop, driver! Will you go in, Watson? Ask the undertaker when the Poultny Square funeral is going to take place.'

The man in the shop told me that it was arranged for eight o'clock the next morning.

When I reported this to Holmes he looked unhappy.

'I can't understand it at all,' he said. 'Murderers usually bury the body in a hole in the back garden. These murderers seem to fear nothing! We must go forward and attack, Watson. Are you armed?'

'I have my stick, at least.'

'Well, well, we shall be strong enough. We simply cannot afford to wait for the police. Thank you, driver; you can go.'

Holmes rang the bell of a great dark house in the centre of Poultney Square. The door was opened immediately by a tall woman.

'Well, what do you want?' she said rudely.

'I want to speak to Dr Schlessinger,' said Holmes.

'There is no Dr Schlessinger here,' she answered. Then she tried to close the door, but Holmes had put his foot in the way.

'Well, I want to see the man who lives here. I don't care what he calls himself,' he said firmly.

She thought for a moment. Then she pulled the door wide open.

'Well, come in!' she said. 'My husband is not afraid to see any man in the world.' She closed the door behind us, and took us into a sitting room on the right of the hall. Before she left us she turned up the gas light in the room. 'Mr Peters will be with you soon,' she said.

NP Almost immediately a man entered the dusty sitting room. Peters the Priest was a big man with a large fat red face, who would have looked pleasant if he had not had such a cruel mouth.

'You have surely made a mistake, gentlemen,' he said in an oily voice. 'I think you have come to the wrong house. If you tried further down the street, perhaps . . .'

'You are wasting your breath,' said my friend. 'My name is Sherlock Holmes. You are Henry Peters, of Adelaide, formerly Dr Schlessinger of Baden-Baden and South America.'

'I am not afraid of you, Mr Holmes. What is your business in my house?'

'I want to know what you have done with Lady Frances Carfax, who came away with you from Baden-Baden.'

'I would be very glad if you could tell me where she is,' Peters answered calmly. 'She borrowed nearly a hundred pounds from me, and has not paid it back. All I have until she pays her debt is some almost worthless jewellery. I paid her hotel bill at Baden-

Baden and I bought her a ticket from there to London. We lost her at Victoria Station. If you can find her, Mr Holmes, I shall be very grateful to you.'

'I am going to find her,' said Sherlock Holmes. 'I am going to search this house until I do find her.'

Holmes took out a gun from his pocket.

'So you are a common thief!' said Peters.

'That is right. And my friend Watson is also a dangerous man. We are now going to search your house together.'

Peters opened the door.

'Call a policeman, Annie!' he called out.

We heard the woman run across the hall and go out through the front door.

'We have very little time, Watson,' said Holmes. 'If you try to stop us, Peters, you will certainly get hurt. Where is the coffin that was brought into this house?'

'Why do you want to look at the coffin?' Peters asked. 'It is in use. There is a body in it.'

'I must see that body.'

'I refuse to show it to you!'

But Holmes had pushed him out of the way. We went together into the next room. It was the dining room of the house. The gas light was burning low, but we saw the coffin immediately. It was on the table. Holmes turned up the gas and opened the coffin. Deep down at the bottom there was the body of a small, very thin, and very, very old woman. It was certainly not Lady Frances Carfax.

'Thank God!' whispered Holmes. 'It is someone else.'

'You have made a bad mistake, haven't you, Mr Holmes?' said Peters, who had followed us into the room.

'Who is this dead woman?' asked Holmes.

'You have no right to ask, but I will tell you. She is my wife's old nurse, Rose Spender. We found her in a hospital for old people in Brixton, and brought her here. We called in a Dr Horsom. Yes, please write down his address in your notebook, Mr Holmes! It is 13 Firbank Street. He took good care of her, but on the third day she died. She was ninety years old, after all. The funeral is to be at eight o'clock tomorrow morning. The undertaker is Mr Stimson, of Kennington Road.'

'I am going to search your house,' said Holmes.

'I don't think you are,' said Peters, who had heard policemen in the hall. 'Come in here, please!' he called out to them. 'These men are in my house without permission. Help me to get rid of them.'

Holmes took out one of his cards.

'This is my name and address,' he said to the policemen, 'and this gentleman is my friend, Dr Watson.'

'We know you very well, sir,' said one of the policemen, 'but you can't stay here and search the house without a court order.'

'Of course not. I realize that,' said Holmes.

'Take him to the police station!' cried Peters.

'We know where to find this gentleman if he is wanted,' said the policeman in reply; 'but you must go now, Mr Holmes. That is the law.'

We went next to the hospital in Brixton. There we were told that two kind people had claimed a dying woman as a former servant of theirs, and had received permission to take her away with them.

We then went to see Dr Horsom, who had looked after the old woman immediately before her death.

'I was with her when she died,' he told us. 'Old age was the cause of death. There was nothing suspicious about it at all.'

'Did you notice anything suspicious in the house?' asked Holmes.

'No. Only that Mr and Mrs Peters had no servants. That is unusual for people of their class.'

The doctor was unable to tell us anything more.

Finally we went to Scotland Yard. We were told that the court order allowing a search of the house would probably not be issued until next morning at about nine.

Sherlock Holmes did not go to bed that night. He smoked for hours, and wandered about the house. At twenty past seven in the morning he rushed into my room.

'The funeral is at eight, Watson! It is 7.20 now. And my thoughts on the Carfax mystery have only just become clear! We must hurry. If we are too late . . .'

In less than five minutes we were in a carriage. But it was twenty-five to eight as we went over Westminster Bridge, and ten past eight when we arrived in Poultny Square. Fortunately the undertaker's men were also a little late, and we were in time to see them carrying the coffin out of the house. Holmes rushed forward.

'Take that coffin back!' he cried, putting his hand on the chest of the first man to push him back into the hall. 'Take it back immediately!'

Then Peters appeared behind the coffin. His red face was very angry.

'Mr Holmes, you have no right to give orders here!' he shouted. 'Show me your court order!'

'It is on its way,' Holmes answered. 'This coffin must remain in the house until it comes.'

The firmness in Holmes's voice had its effect on the undertaker's men. Peters had suddenly disappeared, and they obeyed these new instructions.

They put the coffin back on the dining-room table. In less than a minute we had managed to open it. As we did so, a strong smell of chloroform came out. There was a body in the coffin. The head was wrapped in bandages, which were still wet with the chloroform. Holmes unwrapped the bandages and there was the face of an attractive middle-aged woman. He quickly lifted the body to a sitting position.

'Is she alive, Watson? Surely we are not too late!'

For half an hour it seemed that we were. But in the end our efforts to bring the lady back to life were successful. Her breathing returned; her eyes began to open. A carriage had just arrived, and Holmes went to the window and looked out.

'Here is Lestrade with his court order,' he said. 'But Peters the Priest and Annie Fraser have already escaped. And here is a man who has a better right to nurse this lady than we have! Good morning, Mr Green. I think Lady Frances should be taken away from here as soon as possible. Now the funeral may continue. The poor old woman at the bottom of that coffin can now be buried – alone!'

'I have been very stupid, Watson,' said Holmes that evening. 'I knew that I had heard something important, but I did not know what it was until seven o'clock this morning. It was something the undertaker said to Annie Fraser. Our friend Green heard him say it. "It took longer," the man said, "than an ordinary one would take." Of course he was talking about the coffin. It was an unusual one. Its measurements were not the ordinary ones. It had been made specially – but why? Why? Then I suddenly remembered the deep sides, and the thin little body at the bottom. Why had such a large coffin been made for such a small body?

'There could be only one explanation. It was to leave room for another body: the body of Lady Frances Carfax.'

The Three Garridebs

The case of the three Garridebs began late in June 1902, soon after the end of the South African War. Sherlock Holmes had just spent several days in bed, as was his habit from time to time, but that morning he came out of his bedroom with a pile of handwritten papers in his hand and a look of amusement in his grey eyes.

'My dear Watson, here is a chance for you to make some money,' he said. 'Have you ever heard the name Garrideb?'

I admitted that I had not.

'Well, if you can find a man called Garrideb, both you and he will be rich.'

'How can that be so?' I asked.

'Ah, that's a long story – rather an amusing one, too. Quite unusual, in fact. A man is coming to see me about it in a few minutes, so I won't begin the story until he arrives. But Garrideb is the name we want.'

The telephone book was on the table beside me, and I turned over the pages in rather a hopeless hunt for a Garrideb. But to my surprise there was this strange name in its correct place.

'Here you are, Holmes! Here it is!'

Holmes took the book from my hand.

'"Garrideb, N.," he read, "'136 Little Ryder Street." I am sorry to disappoint you, Watson, but this Garrideb is the person who is employing me. That is the address on his letter. We want another Garrideb to match him.'

Just then our housekeeper, Mrs Hudson, came in and handed me a card.

'Why, here is another!' I cried. 'The first name is different. This is John Garrideb, a lawyer from Kansas in America.'

Holmes smiled as he looked at the card. 'I am afraid you must make one more effort, Watson,' he said. 'I already know about this gentleman, though I certainly did not expect to see him here this morning. But he will be able to tell us a good deal that I want to know.'

NP A moment later he was in the room. Mr John Garrideb was a short, powerful man with a round fresh face. It was easy to believe that he was an American businessman or lawyer. He looked rather childlike, and had a broad, fixed smile on his face. But his eyes were surprising. I have rarely seen a pair of human eyes which were brighter, quicker or sharper. His speech was American, but not very noticeably so.

'Mr Holmes?' he asked, looking at each of us in turn. 'Ah, yes! The photographs of you in the newspapers are not unlike you, sir, if I may say so. I believe you have had a letter from another Garrideb – Mr Nathan Garrideb – haven't you?'

'Please sit down,' said Sherlock Holmes. 'I think we have a good deal to discuss.' He picked up the pile of papers. 'You are, of course, the Mr John Garrideb who is mentioned in these legal documents. But surely you have been in England for some time?'

'Why do you say that, Mr Holmes?' A sudden look of suspicion appeared in the man's eyes.

'Because all your clothes are English.'

Mr Garrideb laughed uncomfortably. 'I've read of your clever tricks as a detective, Mr Holmes, but I never thought I would be the subject of them myself. How do you know my clothes are English?'

'By the shoulders of your coat, the toes of your shoes – how could anyone doubt it?'

'Well, well, I had no idea that I looked so much like an Englishman. But I came to England on business some time ago, and so – as you say – nearly all my clothes were bought in London. But I suppose your time is valuable, and I am not here to talk about fashions! Please let us now discuss those papers which you have in your hand.'

It was clear that in some way Holmes had annoyed our visitor, who now had a much less friendly expression on his round childlike face.

'Have patience, Mr Garrideb!' said my friend gently. 'Dr Watson could tell you that these little tricks of mine are sometimes very useful in the end, in solving mysteries. But why hasn't Mr Nathan Garrideb come with you?'

'Why did he bring you into the affair at all?' asked our visitor, with sudden anger. 'What have you to do with it? Here was a bit of professional business between two gentlemen – and now one of them is employing a private detective! I saw him this morning, and he told me of the stupid thing he had done – and that's why I'm here. But I do feel annoyed about it!'

'Nobody suspects you of anything, Mr Garrideb. Mr Nathan Garrideb is only anxious to achieve something which, I believe, is equally important to both of you. He knew that I had means of getting information, and therefore it was natural that he should come to me.'

The anger gradually disappeared from our visitor's face.

'Well, I'm beginning to understand now,' he said. 'When I went to see him this morning and he told me he had written to a private detective, I just asked for your address and came along immediately. I don't want the police mixed up in a private matter. But if you are happy just to help us find the man, there can be no harm in that.'

'Well, that is exactly what I am going to do,' said Holmes. 'And now, sir, as you are here, you had better give us a clear account of the whole affair. My friend here, Dr Watson, knows nothing of the details.'

NP Mr Garrideb looked at me in a way that was not particularly friendly.

'Need he know?' he asked.

'We usually work together,' said Holmes.

'Well, there's no reason why it should be kept secret. I'll tell you the main facts, then. If you came from Kansas I would not need to explain to you who Alexander Hamilton Garrideb was.

'He made his money by buying and selling houses and land, and afterwards he made a second fortune in the Chicago wheat market. Then he spent the money in buying more land, along the Arkansas River, west of Fort Dodge – and in the end he owned a piece of land as big as Kent or Sussex here in England. It's sheep-farming land, and forest and mining land, and land for growing crops on – in fact it's more or less every sort of land that brings dollars to the man that owns it.

'He had no relatives – or, if he had, I never heard of any. But he took a kind of pride in his unusual name. That was what brought us together. I was a lawyer at Topeka, and one day I had a visit from the old man, who was very excited about meeting another man with his own name. And he was determined to find out if there were any more Garridebs in the world. "Find me another!" he said. I told him I was a busy man and could not spend my life wandering round the world in search of Garridebs. "But that is exactly what you are going to do if everything goes according to my plan," he replied. I thought he was joking, but I soon discovered that he was extremely serious.

'He died less than a year later, and after his death a will was found. It was the strangest will that had ever been seen in the State of Kansas. His property was divided into three parts, and I was to have one on condition that I found two Garridebs who would share the rest. Each of the three shares is worth five million dollars, but until I have found two other Garridebs none of the money is to be paid out.

'It was such an opportunity for me that I simply left my practice as a lawyer and set out to look for Garridebs. There is not a single one in the United States. I searched the whole country very thoroughly, sir, but discovered no Garridebs at all. Then I tried England, where I found the name of Mr Nathan Garrideb in the London telephone book. I went to see the gentleman two days ago and explained the whole matter to him. But, like myself, he is alone in the world, with some female relatives, but no men. According to the old man's will, the three Garridebs must all be adult men. So you see we still need one more man, and if you can help us to find him we will be very ready to pay your charges.'

'Well, Watson,' said Holmes, with a smile. 'I said this was rather an amusing case, didn't I? Mr Garrideb, I think the first thing you should do is to put a small advertisement in the newspapers.'

'I have done that already, Mr Holmes. There were no replies.'

'Oh, how disappointing! Well, it is certainly a very interesting little problem. I may look into it for you if I have time. It is interesting, Mr Garrideb, that you should come from Topeka. I had a friend there who used to write to me – he is dead now – old Dr Lysander Starr, who was a member of the town council in 1890.'

'Good old Dr Starr!' said our visitor. 'His name is still honoured. Well, Mr Holmes, I suppose the only thing we can do is to report to you and let you know how we progress. You will probably hear from us within a day or two.' Then the American left.

Holmes had lit his pipe, and he sat for some time with a strange smile on his face.

'Well, what do you think about all that?' I asked at last.

'I am wondering, Watson – just wondering!'

'About what?'

Holmes took his pipe from his lips.

'I was wondering, Watson, what this man could possibly hope to achieve by telling us such a large number of lies. I nearly asked him what his real purpose was – there are times when a sudden, sharp attack is the best way of dealing with such a person – but I decided that it would be better to let him think he had tricked us. Here is a man with an English coat and English trousers, both showing signs of having been worn for at least a year: but according to his pile of papers, and according also to his own account, he is an American from Kansas who has only recently arrived in London. There have been no advertisements about Garridebs. You know that I miss nothing of that sort. The small advertisements have often been useful to me in my cases, and I could not possibly have failed to notice one like that. I never knew a Dr Lysander Starr of Topeka. Almost everything our visitor said was a lie. I think he really is an American, but he has been in London for years, and his voice has gradually become less and less American. What is his aim, then? What is the purpose of this strange search for Garridebs? The problem is worth our attention. Clearly this man is a criminal, but he is a strange and imaginative one. We must now find out if our other Garrideb is a liar too. Just ring him up, Watson, please.'

I did so, and heard a weak voice, rather like that of a goat, at the other end of the line.

'Yes, yes, I am Mr Nathan Garrideb. Is Mr Holmes there? I should very much like to have a word with Mr Holmes.'

My friend took the telephone from me and I heard his half of the conversation that followed.

'Yes, he has been here. I believe you don't know him... How long?... Only two days!... Yes, yes, of course, to receive five million dollars would be very nice. Will you be at home this evening? I suppose Mr John Garrideb will not be there?... Very good, we will come then. I would rather see you in his absence... Dr Watson will come with me... Yes, in your letter you mentioned you did not go out often... Well, we shall be with you at about six o'clock. You need not mention it to the American lawyer... Very good. Goodbye!'

On that lovely spring evening, even Little Ryder Street, off the Edgware Road (in the rather dull area near Tyburn, where men and women were once cruelly hanged in public), looked golden and beautiful in the setting sun. The particular house to which we were directed was a large, old-fashioned eighteenth-century brick building. On the ground floor there were two tall, wide windows: these belonged to the very large living room of the person we had come to see, who had only the ground floor of the house. As we went up to the door Holmes pointed to the name GARRIDEB on a small plate.

'That name-plate has been there for years, Watson,' he remarked. 'Its surface is quite worn, and it has lost its original colour. So at least Garrideb is his real name!'

The house had a common hall and staircase, and there were a number of names painted in the hall. Some of these names were those of offices; others were those of private persons. No families lived in the house; the people who did live there were unmarried gentlemen of independent habits. Mr Nathan Garrideb opened the door for us himself, explaining that the housekeeper left at four o'clock. He was a very tall, thin man with a bent back. He seemed to be about sixty years old. He had no hair on his head, and the skin of his face looked dull and dead. It was easy to see that he never took any exercise. He wore large round glasses and had a small beard: but though he looked rather strange, he seemed pleasant.

The room was as strange as Mr Nathan Garrideb himself. It looked like a kind of shop. It was both broad and deep and there were cupboards and glass cases everywhere, crowded with old bones and pieces of stone. On either side of the door there stood a case of flying insects, pinned onto cards. All kinds of things were scattered on a large table in the centre of the room. Among them I noticed several powerful magnifying glasses. As I looked round, I was surprised at the number of different subjects Mr Garrideb was interested in. Here was a case of ancient coins. There was a collection of tools from the Stone Age. On a shelf behind the table I saw a row of model heads of monkeys or ancient men, with names such as 'Neanderthal', 'Heidelberg' and 'Cromagnon' written on cards below them. As he stood in front of us now, he held a piece of soft leather in his right hand with which he was polishing a coin.

'From Syracuse. And of the best period,' he explained, holding it up. 'The quality became much worse later. In my opinion there are no finer coins than these Syracusan ones, though some people prefer those from Alexandria. You will find a chair there, Mr Holmes. One moment, please: I will just put those bones somewhere else. And you, sir – ah, yes, Dr Watson – would you mind putting that Japanese flowerpot out of your way? You see round me all the little interests of my life. My doctor is always telling me I ought to take more exercise, but why should I go out? There are so many things to keep me here! Just to make a proper list of all the things in one of these cupboards would take at least three months.'

Holmes looked round him with interest.

'But do you never go out?' he asked.

'Hardly ever. Now and then I take a carriage and go and buy some new things for my collection, but I very rarely leave this room for any other reason. I am not very strong, and my scientific studies keep me very busy. But you can imagine, Mr Holmes, what a shock – what a pleasant shock – it was for me when I heard of this piece of good luck. Only one more Garrideb is needed to make the affair complete, and surely we can find one. I had a brother, but he is dead, and women relatives do not count. But there must be other Garridebs in the world. I had heard that you handled strange cases, and that was why I wrote to you. Of course, this American gentleman is quite right, and I should have taken his advice first. But I acted with the best intentions.'

'I think you acted very wisely,' said Holmes. 'But are you really anxious to become the owner of a large piece of land along the Arkansas River in America?'

'Certainly not, sir. Nothing could make me leave my collection. But this gentleman, Mr John Garrideb, has promised to buy my share of the property from me as soon as we have become the owners of the Garrideb land. Five million dollars was the amount of money he mentioned. There are several unusual things on the market at the present moment which I need for my collection, but which I cannot buy because I lack a few hundred pounds. Just think what I could do with five million dollars! I already have the beginnings of a great national collection!'

The eyes behind his glasses were shining. It was very clear that Mr Nathan Garrideb was ready to take any amount of trouble to find the third Garrideb.

'I just called to meet you, Mr Garrideb,' said Holmes, 'and there is no reason why I should interrupt your studies for more than a few minutes. I like to be in personal touch with those I work for. There are very few questions I need to ask you. I have your letter, with its very clear account, in my pocket, and I heard more of the matter when the American gentleman called. I believe that until this week you had no idea of his existence?'

'That is so. He called last Tuesday.'

'Did he tell you of his visit to me today?'

'Yes, he came straight here after seeing you. He had been very angry before that.'

'Why should he be angry?'

'He seemed to think that my employing a detective was an insult to him as a man of honour. But he was quite cheerful again when he returned.'

'Did he suggest any course of action?'

'No, sir, he did not.'

'Has he received, or asked for, any money from you?'

'No, sir, never!'

'And you can see no possible purpose he may have?'

'No, none, Mr Holmes; except what he has told me – to find a third Garrideb.'

'Did you tell him of our appointment this evening?'

'Yes, sir, I did.'

Holmes sat in silence for a few moments. I could see that the affair was still a mystery to him.

'Have you any very valuable things in your collection?'

'No, sir. I am not a rich man. It is a good collection, but not a very valuable one.'

'You have no fear of thieves?'

'None at all.'

'How long have you lived in these rooms?'

'For nearly five years.'

Holmes's questions were interrupted by a loud knocking at the door. As soon as it was opened, the American lawyer burst excitedly into the room.

NP 'Here you are!' he cried, waving a newspaper high in the air. 'Mr Nathan Garrideb, you are a rich man, sir! Our business is happily finished and all is well. As for you, Mr Holmes, we can only say we are sorry to have put you to all this trouble for nothing.'

He handed the newspaper to the old man, who stood reading an advertisement which the American had marked. Holmes and I leaned forward and read it over his shoulder. This was it:

HOWARD GARRIDEB

MAKER OF FARM MACHINERY

Steam and hand plows, farmers' carts and all other appliances

Grosvenor Buildings, Aston, Birmingham

Excellent!' cried our excited host. 'So now we have found our third man.'

'I had begun making inquiries in Birmingham,' said the American, 'and I have just been sent this advertisement from a local paper. We must hurry and get in touch with this Mr Howard Garrideb. I have already written to him to say that you will see him in his office tomorrow afternoon at four o'clock.'

'You want me to see him?' said Mr Nathan Garrideb, as if this suggestion were a great shock to him.

'Well, what's your opinion, Mr Holmes?' asked Mr John Garrideb. 'Don't you think it would be better for him to go? Here am I, a wandering American with a strange story. Why should Mr Howard Garrideb believe what I tell him? But you, Mr Garrideb, are an Englishman with an honourable position in the world, and he will certainly take what you say seriously. I would go to Birmingham with you if you wished, but I have a very busy day tomorrow – and I could easily come and join you there later if you needed me.'

'Why, I have not made such a journey for years!' said Mr Nathan Garrideb.

'It is the easiest little journey in the world, Mr Garrideb. I have already found out the time of your train. You leave at twelve o'clock and should be in Birmingham soon after two. Then you can come back home in the evening. You only have to see this man, explain the matter, and get a signed statement of his existence. Good heavens!' he added a little angrily. 'Considering that I've come all the way from America, it's surely a very small thing to ask you to do – to travel a hundred miles in order to find the last of the three Garridebs!'

'Mr John Garrideb is quite right,' said Holmes. 'I think what he says is very true.'

Mr Nathan Garrideb's back seemed to become more bent than ever as he said sadly: 'Well, I will go if I must. It is certainly hard for me to refuse you anything, Mr Garrideb, considering the hope that you have brought into my life.'

'Then that is agreed,' said Holmes, 'and no doubt you will let me have a report as soon as you can.'

'I'll arrange that,' said the American. 'Well,' he added, looking at his watch, 'I must go now. I'll call here tomorrow,' he said to Mr Nathan Garrideb, 'and see you off at the station. Are you coming my way, Mr Holmes? No? Well, then, goodbye! We may have good news for you tomorrow night.'

VP I noticed that my friend seemed happier when the American left the room. The thoughtful look had disappeared from his face.

'I wish I could examine your collection, Mr Garrideb,' he said. 'In my profession all sorts of strange bits of knowledge can be useful and this room of yours is full of information.'

Mr Garrideb seemed to shine with pleasure and his eyes were bright behind his big glasses.

'I had always heard, sir, that you were a very intelligent man,' he said. 'I could show you everything now, if you have the time.'

'Unfortunately,' Holmes answered, 'I have not. But your collections are all so well arranged that they hardly need your personal explanation. If I called here tomorrow, I suppose you would not object to my looking round in your absence?'

'Of course not! You would be very welcome. My rooms will, of course, be shut up, but Mrs Saunders is always in the house until four o'clock and would let you in with her key.'

'Well, it so happens that I am free tomorrow afternoon. If you would kindly explain to Mrs Saunders that I will be here, I would be very grateful. — Oh, Mr Garrideb, what is the name of the company through which you rented these rooms?'

Garrideb was surprised at this sudden question.

'Holloway and Steele, in the Edgware Road. Why do you ask?'

'Because I am interested in the history of houses, Mr Garrideb,' Holmes replied, laughing. 'I was wondering if this one was built in the days of Queen Anne, or of King George the First.'

'Oh, King George, without any doubt.'

'Really? I should have thought it was built a little earlier. But I can easily find out for certain. Well, goodbye, Mr Garrideb. I wish you success in your journey to Birmingham!'

We saw the property company's offices as we walked along the Edgware Road, but they were closed for the day, so we made our way back to Baker Street. It was not until after dinner that Holmes mentioned the Garrideb affair again.

'Our little problem is nearly solved,' he said. 'No doubt you too have worked it out in your own mind.'

'I don't understand it at all, Holmes,' I replied.

'Everything will be clear tomorrow. Did you notice anything strange about that advertisement?'

'I saw that the word "plough" was wrongly spelt.'

'Oh, you did notice that, did you? Well done, Watson: you improve all the time. Yes, "plow" is bad English but good American. The printer had copied the advertisement exactly as he received it. It was in fact an American advertisement, but we were expected to believe that it was put in by an Englishman. How do you explain that?'

'I can only suppose that this American lawyer put the advertisement in himself. But I have no idea what his aim in doing so can have been.'

'Well, there are three possible explanations. One thing is very clear: he wanted good old Mr Nathan Garrideb to go off to Birmingham. Of course I could have told the old man that his journey was useless. But I decided it would be better to let him go, and allow the affair to develop according to the intentions of the Kansas lawyer. Tomorrow, Watson — tomorrow will be a day of action!'

Holmes was up and out early the next morning. When he returned at lunchtime I noticed he had a very serious expression on his face.

'This is a more dangerous affair than I had expected, Watson,' he said. 'I have to warn you, though I know that the danger will only be an additional attraction to you! I think I know my Watson by now. But there is danger, and you should realize this.'

'Well, this will not be the first danger that we have shared, Holmes. And I hope it will not be the last! What is the particular danger this time?'

'I have found out who Mr John Garrideb, the Kansas lawyer, really is. He is the murderer, "Killer" Evans – an evil and terrible man.'

'I am afraid I have never heard of him.'

'Ah, it is not part of your profession to keep these details of the history of crime in your memory! I have been down to see our friend Lestrade at Scotland Yard. The London police may lack imagination, but they are remarkably thorough, and I had an idea that I might get on the track of our American friend "Mr John Garrideb" by looking through their records. I soon found a photograph of his round, smiling face. The names under it were James Winter, Morecroft, and Killer Evans.' Holmes pulled out an envelope from his pocket. 'I noted down a few of the other points about him. He is forty-four years old. He was born in Chicago. He is known to have shot three men in the United States, but he got out of prison by means of political influence. He came to London in 1893. In January 1895 he shot a man in a quarrel over a card game in a nightclub in the Waterloo Road. The man died, but he was shown to have started the quarrel. The dead man was Rodger Prescott, who was famous as a forger in Chicago. Killer Evans was sent to prison, but came out last year. Since then the police have been watching his movements, but he seems to have been leading an honest life. He is a very dangerous man, usually carries a gun, and is not afraid to fire it. That is our man, Watson!

'But what is his aim in this Garrideb affair?' I asked.

'Well, that is becoming clearer. I have been to the property office. Mr Nathan Garrideb, as he told us, has been at Little Ryder Street for five years. The rooms were empty for a year before he moved in. Before that, they were let to a mysterious gentleman called Waldron, who was well remembered at the office. He suddenly disappeared and nothing more was heard of him. He was a tall, very dark man with a beard. Now, Prescott, the man whom Killer Evans shot, was, according to our friends at Scotland Yard, also a tall, dark man with a beard. My guess is that Prescott, the American criminal, used to live in Little Ryder Street, in the room where old Mr Garrideb keeps his collection. So at last we have a connection, you see.'

'And where is the next clue?'

'Well, we must go now and look for that.'

He took a gun from the drawer and handed it to me.

'I have my own gun with me,' he said. 'If Killer Evans begins shooting we must be prepared. I'll give you an hour for your afternoon sleep, Watson, and then I think it will be time for our Little Ryder Street adventure.'

It was just four o'clock when we reached Mr Nathan Garrideb's strange home. Mrs Saunders was about to leave, but she let us in. The door shut with a spring lock and Holmes promised to make sure that everything was safe before we left. Soon afterwards the front door of the house closed and we saw Mrs Saunders pass the windows. We were now alone in the lower part of the house. Holmes made a rapid examination of the rooms. There was one cupboard in a dark corner which stood out a little from the wall. It was behind this that we hid, while Holmes spoke to me in a whisper.

'Evans wanted to get the old gentleman out of his room – that is very clear; but as the collector never went out, Evans's problem was not an easy one to solve. It seems that all his lies about the Garrideb will and the Garrideb land had no other purpose than to get Mr Nathan Garrideb away from the house for one day. One has to admit, Watson, that Evans's lies did have a certain cleverness about them – though the old collector's unusual name gave him an opportunity which he could hardly have expected.

'But what can the man possibly want here?' I asked.

'Well, that is what we are here to find out. I don't think it has anything whatever to do with our client. It is something connected with the man that Evans killed – a man who may have been involved with him in criminal activities of some kind. There is some guilty secret in this room, I think. At first I thought Mr Nathan Garrideb might have something in his collection that was more valuable than he realized – something worth the attention of a big criminal. But when I discovered that the evil Rodger Prescott used to live here, I realized that there must be some quite different explanation. Well, Watson, the only thing we can do now is to have patience and wait and watch.'

MP We did not have to wait long. A few moments later we heard the front door of the house open and shut. Then there was the sound of a key in the lock, and the American was in the room. He closed the door quietly behind him, gave a quick look round the room to check that he was alone, threw off his coat, and walked up to the table in the centre of the room with the firm step of a man who knows exactly what he has to do and how to do it. He pushed the table to one side and pulled up the floor covering on which it stood. Then he rolled it completely back, took a tool from his inside pocket, and knelt down to work on the floor. A moment later we heard the sound of sliding boards, and a square hole appeared in the floor. Evans struck a match, lit a lamp, and disappeared down the hole.

This was clearly our opportunity. Holmes touched my wrist as a signal, and together we moved quietly across the room towards the hole. But in spite of our efforts to make no noise, Evans must have heard a slight sound as we passed over the old floorboards, since his head suddenly came up out of the open space and he looked anxiously round the room. When he saw us a look of anger, disappointment and hatred appeared on his face. This gradually changed to a broad smile as he realized that two guns were aimed at his head.

'Well, well!' he said coldly as he climbed up out of the hole. 'You have been too clever for me, Mr Holmes. I suppose you realized from the first that I was telling lies. Well, sir, you have beaten me and . . .'

In a sudden movement he pulled out a gun from an inside pocket and fired two shots. I felt a sudden hot tearing pain, as if a red-hot iron had been pressed against the top of my leg. There was a crash as Holmes's gun came down on Evans's head. I saw the man lying on the floor with blood running down his face, while Holmes searched him for other weapons. Then my friend's arms were round me and he was leading me to a chair.

'You're not hurt, Watson? Oh, please say that you're not hurt!'

I did not mind the wound – I would not have minded many wounds – because if I had not been hit I should never have known the loyalty and love that Holmes felt for me, feelings which he almost always hid beneath his unemotional expression and manner. For a moment I saw tears in those clear, hard eyes of his; and the firm lips were shaking. I suddenly realized that Holmes had a great heart as well as a great mind. That moment of realization was my reward for years of service.

'It's nothing, Holmes. It's just a small wound.'

He had made a long tear in my trousers with his pocket knife.

'You are right!' he cried. 'The skin is hardly broken.' He turned to our prisoner and gave him a cold, hard look. 'It is a lucky thing for you. If you had killed Watson, you would not have got out of this room alive. Now, sir, what have you got to say?'

He had nothing to say. He only lay there and looked at us with a child's anger. I leaned on Holmes's arm, and together we looked down into the small room at the bottom of the hole in the floor. It was still lit by the lamp which Evans had taken down with him. We saw a lot of old machinery, great rolls of paper, a quantity of bottles, and – tidily arranged on a small table – a number of neat little piles.

'A printing press – for printing forged notes,' said Holmes.

'Yes, sir,' said our prisoner, struggling to his feet and then sinking into a chair. 'Prescott was the greatest forger there has ever been in London. That's his machine, and those piles on the table are 2,000 of his bank notes. Each of them is worth a hundred pounds and is good enough to pass for real money. Help yourselves, gentlemen, and let me go. Let's make a deal!'

Holmes laughed.

'We don't do things like that in this country, Mr Evans. You shot this man Prescott, didn't you?'

'Yes, sir, and I was sent to prison for five years for doing it, though it was he who pulled out his gun first. Five years in prison – when I ought to have been given a reward by the King! There isn't a man living who could see the difference between a Prescott note and a Bank of England one, and if I hadn't killed him he would have filled London with them. I was the only man in the world who knew where he made them. Can you blame me for wanting to get to the place? And when I found the old bone collector with the unusual name sitting right on top of it, of course I had to do what I could to get rid of him. Perhaps it would have been wiser simply to shoot him. It would have been very easy to do that, but I have a soft heart and can't begin shooting unless the other man has a gun too. But, Mr Holmes, what have I done wrong? I haven't used that machinery down there. I haven't hurt old Mr Garrideb. What crime are you charging me with?'

'Only attempted murder, I think,' said Holmes. 'But that isn't our job. It will be a matter for Scotland Yard. Just ring them up, Watson, would you, please? The call won't be completely unexpected.'

So those were the facts about Killer Evans and his invention of the three Garridebs. We heard later that our poor old friend Mr Nathan Garrideb never got over the disappointment of not receiving any of the Garrideb money. He lost his mind and was taken away to a special hospital in Brixton.

It was a happy day at Scotland Yard when the Prescott machinery was discovered; they knew that it existed, but after Prescott's death they had never been able to find out where it was. Many high officials at the Yard could now sleep more peacefully at night, and felt so grateful to Evans for leading them to Prescott's press that they would gladly have given him the reward of which he had spoken. But the judge took a less favourable view of the case, and Killer Evans was sent back to the prison which he had so recently left.

Wisteria House

It was a cold and windy day towards the end of March. Sherlock Holmes and I were sitting at lunch when there was a knock at the door and a telegram was brought in. Holmes read it and quickly wrote a reply, but he said nothing to me about it. The matter must have remained in his thoughts, though, as he kept looking at the telegram. At last, after lunch, he read it out loud to me:

HAVE JUST HAD A STRANGE EXPERIENCE. MAY I CONSULT YOU?
SCOTT ECCLES, POST OFFICE, CHARING CROSS.

'Is Scott Eccles a man or a woman?' I asked.

'Oh, a man, of course! No woman would ever send a telegram like that. A woman would have come straight to me.'

'And did you agree to see Mr Scott Eccles?'

'My dear Watson, need you ask? You know how much I enjoy exercising my brain.' Just then there was the sound of footsteps on the stairs. 'Ah! Here comes our visitor now.'

The visitor was tall, fat and very serious. His grey hair stuck out from his head and his red face seemed to be swollen with anger.

'I have had a very strange and unpleasant experience, Mr Holmes,' he said immediately, 'and I have come to you for an explanation!'

'Please sit down, Mr Scott Eccles,' said Holmes gently. 'Now tell me exactly why you have come to me.'

'Well, sir, there has been no crime, and so I could not go to the police. But when you have heard the facts, you must admit that I could not leave the matter where it was. Of course I have never had any dealings with a private detective before, but . . .'

'Why didn't you come immediately?' interrupted Holmes.

'What do you mean?' asked Mr Scott Eccles.

Holmes looked at his watch. 'It is now a quarter past two,' he said. 'Your telegram was sent from Charing Cross at about one o'clock. But your clothing and appearance show that your bad experience happened as soon as you woke up this morning.'

Scott Eccles looked down at his untidy clothes, smoothed down his unbrushed hair and felt his rough chin.

'You are right, Mr Holmes. I had no time to think about my appearance this morning. I wanted to get out of that house as quickly as I could! But I made some inquiries of my own before coming to you. I went to the property company first. They told me that Mr Garcia has paid his rent and that everything is in order at Wisteria House.'

'My dear sir,' Holmes said with a laugh, 'you are like my friend Dr Watson, who has a bad habit of beginning his stories at the end. Please arrange your thoughts and let me know exactly what those events are which have sent you out in search of advice and help. Begin at the beginning.'

But there was an interruption. Mrs Hudson showed Tobias Gregson and another police officer into the room. Gregson was a Scotland Yard detective. He shook hands with Holmes, and introduced the other officer as Mr Baynes of the Surrey police. Then he turned to Mr Scott Eccles.

'Are you Mr John Scott Eccles, of Popham House, Lee?'

'Yes, I am.'

'We have been following you about all morning.'

'But why? What do you want?' he asked.

'We want a statement from you,' said Gregson, 'about the death of Mr Aloysius Garcia, of Wisteria House, near Esher.'

Mr Scott Eccles's face was white now. 'Dead? Did you say he was dead?'

'Yes, sir, he died last night.'

'But how did he die? Was it an accident?'

'It was murder, without any doubt.'

'Oh God! This is terrible! You don't mean – you don't mean that I am suspected?'

'A letter of yours was found in the dead man's pocket. It shows that you were intending to spend last night at his house.'

'And so I did.'

'Ah!' Gregson took out his notebook.

'Wait a moment, Gregson,' said Holmes. 'You want a plain statement from Mr Scott Eccles, don't you?'

'And it is my duty to warn Mr Scott Eccles that it may be used against him.'

'Mr Scott Eccles was going to tell us about it when you entered the room. Give our friend a glass of brandy, please, Watson. Now, sir, please try to forget the presence of these police officers and tell us everything.'

NP Our visitor swallowed his brandy, and the colour began to return to his face.

'I am unmarried,' he began, 'and I have many friends. One of these is Mr Melville, an older gentleman who lives in Kensington. A few weeks ago I went to dinner at the Melvilles and they introduced me to a young man called Garcia. He told me that he worked for the Spanish government in London, but he spoke perfect English. He was very good-looking and had excellent manners. He seemed to like me very much, and only two days later he came to see me at Lee. Before long he invited me to spend a few days at his house, Wisteria House, between Esher and Oxshott in Surrey. I arranged to begin my visit yesterday evening.'

'Garcia had already described his household to me. There was a Spanish servant and an excellent American-Indian cook.'

'I hired a carriage at Esher Station. Wisteria House is about two miles away, on the south side of the village. It is quite a big house, in its own grounds, but is in extremely poor condition.'

'Garcia opened the door to me himself, and gave me a very friendly welcome. Then the Spanish servant showed me to my bedroom. He seemed as dark and sad as the house itself.'

'At dinner I was the only guest. Garcia did his best to entertain me, but I could see that his thoughts were wandering. He bit his nails and kept drumming with his fingers on the table. He seemed to be very impatient. The meal itself was neither well cooked nor well served. Many times that evening I wished I was back at home.'

'Towards the end of dinner the servant brought Garcia a note. I noticed that my host's behaviour became even more strange after he had read it. He no longer attempted to make conversation, but only sat and smoked. At about eleven o'clock I went to bed. Some time later Garcia looked in at my door and asked me if I had rung the bell. I said that I had not. He said he was sorry about coming to my room so late; it was, he told me, nearly one o'clock. When he had gone I fell asleep, and I did not wake up until almost nine. I had asked the Spanish servant to call me at eight, and I was surprised at his forgetfulness. I jumped out of bed and rang the bell. Nobody came. I rang again and again, but still nothing happened. I thought that perhaps the bell was out of order. I dressed quickly and then ran angrily downstairs to order some hot water, but there was no one there. I shouted in the hall. There was no answer. Then I ran from room to room. There was nobody anywhere. I knocked at Garcia's bedroom door. No reply. I turned the handle and walked in. The room was empty, and the bed had not been slept in. He too had gone! The foreign host, the foreign servant, the foreign cook – all had disappeared in the night! That was the end of my visit to Wisteria House.'

Sherlock Holmes rubbed his hands with pleasure. 'And what did you do next?' he asked.

'I was very angry. At first I thought it was a joke. I packed my bag, left the house, and walked into Esher. I called at Allan Brothers, the main property company in the village, and asked some questions about Mr Garcia and Wisteria House. I thought that perhaps Garcia had gone away suddenly in order to avoid paying the rent. But the man there thanked me for warning them, and told me that Garcia had paid the rent several months ahead. Then I returned to London and made some inquiries about Spanish government employees. The man was unknown to any officials. After this I went to see Melville, at whose house I had first met Garcia, but he really knew very little about the man. Then I sent that telegram to you. A friend of mine had mentioned your name to me: he said you gave advice in difficult cases.' Mr Scott Eccles turned now to Gregson. 'I have told the whole truth, officer. I know nothing more about Mr Garcia and his death. I only want to help the police in every possible way.'

'I'm sure of that, Mr Scott Eccles,' answered Gregson. 'Your story agrees perfectly with all the facts of the case. For example, there was that note which arrived during dinner at Wisteria House. What did Garcia do with it after he had read it?'

'He rolled it up and threw it into the fire.'

'Well, Mr Baynes?' asked Gregson, turning to the other police officer. Baynes was a country detective, a fat man with a red face and bright, clever eyes. He smiled and took a small piece of paper out of his pocket. Its edges were burnt.

'Garcia threw badly,' he said. 'The letter was only slightly burnt, as it fell into the fireplace and not into the fire. Shall I read it out loud to these gentlemen, Mr Gregson?'

'Certainly, Mr Baynes.'

'It says: "Our own colours, green and white. Green open, white shut. Main stairs, first passage, seventh on the right, green door. D." The note is written on cream-coloured paper. It has been folded over three times and is addressed to Mr Garcia, Wisteria House. The letter is in a woman's handwriting, but we think the address was written by someone else.'

'But what has happened to Garcia?' asked Mr Scott Eccles.

'He was found dead this morning in a field near Oxshott, about a mile from his home. All the bones in his head had been crushed by several blows from some large heavy weapon. It's a lonely place, and the nearest house is a quarter of a mile away.'

'Had he been robbed?' asked Holmes.

'No, there was no attempt at robbery,' replied Baynes.

'All this is very painful and terrible,' said Mr Scott Eccles, 'but why am I mixed up in the affair?'

'Because the only paper in Mr Garcia's pocket was your letter, sir,' answered Baynes. 'It was the envelope of this letter which gave us the dead man's name and address. When we reached his house at half past nine this morning, we found neither you nor anyone else inside. Mr Gregson tracked you down at Charing Cross Post Office by means of your telegram.'

'And now, sir,' said Gregson, 'you must come with us to Scotland Yard and give us your statement in writing.'

'Certainly, I will come immediately. But I still wish you to help me, Mr Holmes. I want to know the truth about this affair!'

'Mr Baynes, do you know exactly when the man was killed?' asked Holmes.

'He had been lying in the field since one o'clock. There was rain at about that time, and the murder certainly happened before the rain.'

'But that is quite impossible, Mr Baynes!' cried Scott Eccles. 'He spoke to me in my bedroom at one o'clock.'

'It is certainly strange,' said Sherlock Holmes with a smile, 'but not impossible.'

◆ MP
'Have you formed any opinion about this affair, Watson?' asked Holmes, later the same afternoon.

'As the servants have disappeared, I think that perhaps they were concerned in the crime,' I said.

'It is possible,' he said. 'But why should they attack him on the one night when he had a guest?'

'But why did they run away?' I objected.

'That, Watson, is the problem. Mr Scott Eccles's strange experience is also a mystery. Why should a pleasant young man like Garcia want the friendship of a rather stupid middle-aged person like Scott Eccles? What is Scott Eccles's most noticeable quality? He is clearly an honest man, an old-fashioned Englishman whom other Englishmen believe and trust. You saw how those two policemen accepted his strange story! Garcia wanted him as a witness, Watson.'

'But what was he supposed to witness?'

'He could have sworn that his host was at home at one o'clock this morning. When Garcia told him it was one, it was probably no later than midnight.'

'What is your explanation of the message? "Our own colours, green and white—"'

'That sounds like a horse race,' Holmes replied. 'And "Green open, white shut" must be a signal. The rest of the note seems to be an appointment. There may be a jealous husband somewhere in this case. Then there is the signature—'

'The man was a Spaniard. Perhaps the letter D stands for Dolores, since that is a common female name in Spain.'

'Good, Watson, very good — but quite impossible. A Spaniard would write to another Spaniard in Spanish. The writer of this note is certainly English. The affair is still very mysterious. I have sent a telegram which may bring us some helpful information.'

When the answer to Holmes's telegram came, he passed it across to me. It was only a list of names and addresses. "Lord Harringby,"' I read, "'The Dingle; Sir George Ffolliott, Oxshott Towers; Mr Hynes, Purdey Place; Mr James Baker-Williams, Forton Old Hall; Mr Henderson, High Gable; Mr Joshua Stone, Nether Walsling." I don't quite understand, Holmes.'

'My dear friend, have you forgotten the message that "D" sent to Garcia? "Main stairs, first passage, seventh on the right . . ." The house we are looking for has more than one staircase, and one of the passages contains at least seven doors. It must be a very large house, Watson, and it is probably within a mile or two of Oxshott. My telegram was to Allan Brothers, the property company. I asked them to send me a list of all the large houses in the Oxshott area, and here it is.'

NP

We travelled down to Esher by train later in the afternoon and took rooms in the village at the Bull Hotel. We went along to Wisteria House with Mr Baynes that evening. The house was in darkness except for a low light in one window on the ground floor.

'There's a policeman inside,' Baynes explained. 'I'll knock at the window.' He crossed the grass and knocked on the glass. I heard a cry and saw a policeman jump up nervously from his chair. A moment later he opened the front door to us. He was shaking violently.

'What's the matter, Walters?' asked Baynes.

'I am glad you have come, sir. It has been a long wait; it's a lonely, silent house, and that strange thing in the kitchen, too. When you knocked at the window, I thought the devil had come again.'

'What do you mean?' Baynes asked sharply.

'The devil, sir. It was at the window.'

'What was at the window, and when?'

'It was about two hours ago. It was just beginning to get dark.'

I was reading. I don't know what made me look up, but there was a horrible face at the window. I shall see it in my dreams, sir, I know I shall.'

'A policeman should never talk in that way, Walters.'

'I know, sir. But it really frightened me. It wasn't black, sir, and it wasn't white. It was a kind of light brown, the colour of clay. And it was very large, sir – twice the size of your face. And it had big eyes, and great white teeth like a wild animal's.'

'I think you must have been dreaming, Walters!' said Baynes.

'We can easily find out,' said Holmes. He lit his small pocket lamp and looked closely at the grass outside the window. 'Yes, a size twelve shoe, I think. He must have been a big man.'

'Where did he go?' I asked.

'He seems to have walked through these bushes.'

'Well,' said Baynes, 'we have other things to think of now, Mr Holmes. Let me show you the kitchen.'

This was a high, dark room at the back of the house. We saw a pile of straw and a few bedclothes. It appeared that the cook slept there. The table was covered with dirty plates and half-eaten food – the remains of the meal which Mr Scott Eccles had shared the previous evening.

'Look at this,' said Baynes. 'What do you think it is?'

He held up his lamp to let us see a strange object on top of a cupboard. It was a black, leathery, dried-up thing shaped like a baby or a small monkey. A double band of seashells was tied round it.

'Interesting!' said Holmes. 'Very interesting! Is there anything else?'

In silence Baynes led the way to the other side of the kitchen and held up his lamp again. There, on a small table, we saw the legs, wings, head and body of a large white bird. The feathers were still on them, but the bird had been torn to pieces.

'How strange!' said Holmes. 'This really is a very unusual case.'

Mr Baynes had kept the most horrible thing of all until the last. He bent down and pulled a bucket out from under the small table. It was full of blood.

'We also found some burnt bones,' he said. 'A young goat seems to have been killed here. A young goat and a white bird.'

'Very strange,' said Holmes. 'Very strange and very interesting. Well, there is nothing more for me to do here. Thank you, Mr Baynes. Good night and good luck!'

MP

Over the next few days, Holmes told me nothing of the results of his inquiries. One day he visited a library in London, but he spent most of his time in country walks around Esher and Oxshott. He pretended to be a collector of rare plants, but he spent many hours in conversation with the village people. His plant box was usually almost empty in the evenings when he came back to the hotel where we were staying.

About five days after the crime I opened my morning paper and saw in large letters:

THE OXSHOTT MYSTERY A SOLUTION MURDERER CAUGHT

When I read this out to Holmes, he jumped out of his chair as if he had been stung.

'Good heavens!' he cried. 'So Baynes has got him?'

'It appears that he has,' I replied, and read the report out loud to him.

'Great excitement was caused in Esher and the neighbouring area last night when a man was charged in connection with the Oxshott murder. Our readers will remember that Mr Garcia, of Wisteria House, was found dead near Oxshott last week. His body showed signs of extreme violence. On the same night his servant and his cook disappeared. Their flight seemed to show that they had something to do with the murder. The police thought that the dead man might have had gold or jewels in the house, and that robbery was the real reason for the crime. Mr Baynes of the Surrey police made great efforts to track the two servants down. He believed that they had not gone far, and that it would be easy to find their hiding place. The cook in particular was a man of very noticeable appearance, a large, dark-skinned foreigner. This man was seen by one of Baynes's men, Walters, at Wisteria House on the day after the crime. After this, Mr Baynes decided to move his men from the house to the grounds, where they hid behind the trees every evening. The cook walked into this trap last night. In the struggle Downing, another policeman, was badly bitten, but the man was overpowered and taken to the police station. We are told that the prisoner has been charged with the murder of Mr Garcia.'

'We must see Baynes immediately!' cried Holmes, picking up his hat.

The house where Baynes was staying was only a short distance away. We hurried down the village street and found that he was just leaving.

'You've seen the paper, Mr Holmes?' he asked, holding one out to us.

'Yes, Baynes, I've seen it. Please don't be angry with me if I give you a word of friendly warning.'

'Of warning, Mr Holmes?'

'I have looked into the case very carefully, and I think you may be making a mistake. I don't want you to do anything unless you are sure.'

'You're very kind, Mr Holmes.'

'I am only speaking for your own good.'

It seemed to me that Mr Baynes closed one of his eyes for a moment and gave a slight smile.

'You have your methods, Mr Holmes, and I have mine.'

'Oh, very good,' said Holmes. 'But don't blame me if things go wrong.'

'No, sir. I believe you mean well. But I am dealing with this case in my own way.'

'Let us say no more about it . . .'

'But let me tell you about the cook. He's a wild man, as strong as a carthorse and as violent as the devil. He nearly bit Downing's thumb off before they could master him. He hardly speaks a word of English, and only makes noises in his throat like an animal.'

'And you think that he murdered his master?'

'I didn't say so, Mr Holmes; I didn't say so. We all have our own methods. You can try yours and I will try mine.'

NP

'I don't understand Baynes at all,' said Holmes as we walked away together. 'He seems to be on completely the wrong track. Well, as he says, each of us must try his own way. We shall see the results!'

When we were back in our sitting room at the Bull Hotel, Holmes asked me to sit down.

'I have many things to tell you about this case, Watson,' he said. 'And I may need your help tonight.'

'First of all,' he went on, 'I have been thinking about the note that Garcia received on the evening of the murder. We can dismiss the idea that his servants had anything to do with his death. It was Garcia who was planning a crime that night. It was he who invited Scott Eccles, the perfect witness. And it was he who lied to him about the time. I believe Garcia died in the course of a criminal adventure.'

'Who, then,' Holmes continued, 'is most likely to have taken his life? Surely the person against whom Garcia's criminal plan was directed.

'We can now see a reason for the disappearance of the people in Garcia's house. They were all involved in his plan. If the plan had succeeded, Garcia would have returned home and Scott Eccles would have been useful to him as a witness. All would have been well. But the attempt was a dangerous one, and if Garcia did not return by a certain time the servants would know he was probably dead. It had been arranged, therefore, that in such a case they would escape to their hiding place. From that hiding place they could make another attempt to carry out the plan. That would fully explain the facts, wouldn't it?'

The mystery seemed much clearer to me now. I wondered, as I always did with Holmes, why I had not thought of the explanation myself.

'But why should one of the servants return to Wisteria House?' I objected.

'I think that perhaps in the confusion of flight something valuable, something he could not bear to lose, had been left behind. That would explain both his visits, wouldn't it?'

'Yes, you're right,' I said. 'But you were going to tell me about the note that Garcia received at dinner on the evening of the murder.'

'Ah, yes. That note shows that the woman who wrote it was involved in the plan too. But where was she? I have already shown you that the place could only be some large house, and that the number of large houses is limited. Since we arrived in Esher I have looked at all these houses and made inquiries about their owners. One house, and only one, especially attracted my attention. This was the famous old house called High Gable, one mile out of Oxshott. High Gable is less than half a mile from the place where Garcia's body was found. The other big houses belong to ordinary, old-fashioned people to whom nothing exciting ever happens. But Mr Henderson, of High Gable, is certainly an unusual man – a man who would be likely to have strange adventures. I therefore decided to give all my attention to Mr Henderson and the people in his house.

'They are a strange set of people, Watson. The man himself is the strangest of them all. I managed to think of a reason for asking to see him. But I think he guessed my real purpose. He is about fifty years old, strong and active, with grey hair and dark, deep-set, troubled eyes. He is a strong, hard, masterful man. Either he is a foreigner or else he has spent most of his life in very hot countries. His face is like leather. There is no doubt that his friend and secretary, Mr Lucas, is a foreigner. He is chocolate brown, a cat-like person with a very gentle, polite voice. Gentle, but poisonous, and evil, I am sure. You see, Watson, we now know of two separate groups of foreigners – one at Wisteria House and the other at High Gable. I think we shall find the solution of our mystery in the connection between these two groups.

'Henderson and Lucas, who are close and trusted friends, are at the centre of the High Gable group. But there is one other person who may be even more important to us in our present inquiries. Henderson has two young daughters. One is thirteen and the other is eleven. They are taught by a lady called Miss Burnet. She is an Englishwoman, about forty years old. I am particularly interested in Miss Burnet, Watson. There is also one personal servant – a man.

'This little group forms the real family. They all travel about together. Henderson is a great traveller and is always on the move. It is only within the last few weeks that he has returned to High Gable after being away for a whole year. He is extremely rich, you see. He can easily afford to satisfy any desire as soon as he becomes conscious of it.

'The house is full of other servants of every kind. You know what the servants of a large English country house are like. They have very little work to do, but they eat meat four times a day!

'Servants can be very useful to a detective, you know. There is no better way of getting information than making friends with one of them. I was lucky enough to find a former gardener of Henderson's. His name is John Warner. Henderson dismissed him recently in a moment of temper. Luckily Warner still has friends among the High Gable servants, who all greatly fear and dislike their master. So I had a key to all the secrets of the place.

'And what a strange group of people it is, Watson! I don't understand everything yet, but it is certainly unusual. There are two wings to the house. The servants live on one side and the family on the other. The only connection between the two is Henderson's own personal servant, who serves the family's meals. Everything is carried to a certain door in the servants' wing. This door is the only one that communicates with the other wing of the house. The girls and their teacher hardly ever go out, except into the garden. And Henderson never goes out alone. His dark secretary is like his shadow. The servants say that their master is terribly afraid of something. Warner says that he has sold his soul to the devil in exchange for money. "The master's afraid that the ground will open and that the devil will come up to claim him!" he says. Nobody knows where the Hendersons came from, or who they are. They are very violent people. Twice Henderson has struck people with his whip, and has had to pay them a lot of money in order to stay out of the courts.

'Well, now, Watson, all this new information should help us to judge the situation. It seems certain that the letter came out of this strange house. I believe it was an invitation to Garcia to carry out some attempt which had already been planned. Who can have written the note? It was someone inside the house, and it was a woman. Isn't the only possible person Miss Burnet, the teacher? All our reasoning seems to support that idea. But Miss Burnet's age and character make any idea of a love affair impossible.

'If she wrote the note, she must have been involved in her friend Garcia's plan. Now he died in trying to carry out that plan. So she must have felt great bitterness and hatred towards their enemies. She must want revenge, Watson. Could we see her, then, and try to use her?

'That was my first thought. But Miss Burnet has not been seen since the night of the murder. She has completely disappeared. Is she still alive? Or was she perhaps killed on the night of Garcia's death? Or is she only being kept prisoner somewhere? If so, her life may still be in danger.

'Unfortunately the police cannot help us here. It would not be possible to get a court order to search the place. We still lack proof. So I am watching the house. I am employing Warner to stand on guard near the gates. But we can't let this situation continue. If the law can do nothing, we must take the risk ourselves.'

'What do you suggest?' I asked.

'I know which Miss Burnet's room is. There is a low roof outside the window. My suggestion is that you and I go there tonight and climb in.'

This idea did not seem very attractive to me. The thought of that old house with its frightening owner and its connections with violent death worried me. And I did not really want to break the law. But I could never refuse Holmes anything; his reasoning always persuaded me. I knew that his plan was the only way of solving the mystery of Garcia's death. I pressed his hand silently to show that I would be ready for even the wildest adventure.

But our inquiries did not have such an adventurous ending. It was about five o'clock, and the shadows of the March evening were beginning to fall, when a countryman rushed into our sitting room in a state of great excitement.

'They've gone, Mr Holmes. They went by the last train. The lady ran away, and I've got her in a carriage down below.'

'Excellent, Warner!' cried Holmes, jumping to his feet. 'We shall know the solution very soon now, Watson.'

The woman in the carriage seemed to be very weak and tired. Her head hung down, but she slowly raised it to look up at us. Her face was thin and sad. In the centre of each of her dull eyes I saw the signs of opium. She had been drugged!

'I watched the gates, as you told me to, Mr Holmes,' said Warner, Henderson's former gardener. 'When the carriage came out I followed it to the station. She was like a person walking in her sleep. But when they tried to get her into the train she came to life and struggled. They pushed her in, but she fought her way out again. I took her arm and helped her. I got her into a carriage, and here we are. I shan't easily forget the master's face at the window of that train! I could see murder in his eyes. The black-eyed devil!'

We carried Miss Burnet upstairs and laid her on one of the beds. Two cups of the strongest coffee quickly cleared her brain from the mists of opium.

Mr Baynes, whom we had sent for immediately, shook Holmes by the hand. 'Well done, Mr Holmes! I was on the same track as you from the first.'

'What! You were after Henderson?'

'That's right. While you were hiding in the garden at High Gable I was up in one of the trees. I saw you down below.'

'Then why did you lock up Garcia's cook?'

Baynes laughed.

'I took the wrong man in to make Henderson think he was safe,' he said. 'He would think we weren't watching him. I knew he would be likely to run away then. That would give us a chance of getting hold of Miss Burnet.'

'Tell me, Baynes, who is Henderson?'

'Henderson is really Juan Murillo, who was once known as "the Tiger of San Pedro". He was an evil Central American ruler who escaped from the area after an uprising against him, taking with him many valuables belonging to the nation that he had governed with fear. He was a cruel, cold-hearted thief and everybody hated him.

'Yes,' Baynes continued, 'he escaped. He completely disappeared, and none of his enemies knew where he was. But they wanted revenge, and they did not rest until they found him.'

'The national colours of San Pedro are green and white, as in Miss Burnet's letter. Murillo called himself Henderson, but he had other names in Paris, Rome, Madrid and Barcelona. His enemies have only recently found his hiding place.'

'They discovered him a year ago,' said Miss Burnet, who had sat up and was listening with keen attention. 'This time Garcia has been killed, but before long our plan will succeed and the Tiger of San Pedro will be put to death!' Her thin hands tightened with the violence of her hatred.

'But why are you mixed up in these foreign political affairs, Miss Burnet?' Holmes asked. 'One does not expect to find an English lady concerned in murder.'

'I must take part!' she cried. 'Through me this criminal will be punished. Justice will be done. He has carried out many murders and stolen so many valuables. To you his robberies and murders are just crimes that are done in some faraway place. But we know. We have learned the truth in sorrow and in suffering. To us there is no devil as bad as Juan Murillo. For us there can be no peace until we have had our revenge.'

'No doubt he was a very bad ruler,' said Holmes. 'But how are you concerned in the affairs of the State of San Pedro?'

'I will tell you everything. My real name is Mrs Victor Durando. My husband was the London representative of the San Pedro government. He met me and married me in this country. Oh, he was a fine, honest man! And because he was so honest, Murillo had him shot. All his property was taken away too.'

'Then came the uprising. A secret society was formed with the aim of punishing Juan Murillo for all his crimes. At last we managed to find out that Mr Henderson of High Gable, Oxshott, was really the Tiger of San Pedro. I was given the job of getting closer to him and watching all his movements. I smiled at him, carried out my duties with his children, and waited. The society had attempted to kill him in Paris once before, but had failed.

'It was not easy to plan our revenge. Aloysius Garcia and his two servants, all of whom had suffered under the evil rule of Murillo, came to live in the area. But Garcia could do little during the day, as the Tiger was very careful. He never went out alone. His friend Lucas, whose real name is Lopez, always went with him. But at night he slept alone. This gave us our chance. We arranged to make our attempt on a certain evening. Murillo often changed his bedroom, and it was necessary to send Garcia a note on the day itself. The signal of a green light in a window would mean that the doors were open and that it was safe. A white light would mean "Don't come in tonight".

'But everything went wrong for us. Lopez, the secretary, became suspicious. He came up behind me quietly as I was writing the note, and jumped on me as soon as I had finished it. He and his master dragged me to my room, and then discussed whether or not to murder me with their knives there and then. In the end they decided that it would be too dangerous. But Garcia had to die! Murillo twisted my arm until I gave them the address. Lopez addressed the note which I had written. Then he sent José, the servant, with it. Murillo must have been responsible for the actual murder, as Lopez remained to guard me.

'After that terrible night, they kept me locked in my room. Oh, they treated me very cruelly! Look at these red marks on my arms! Once I tried to call out from the window, but they tied a thick cloth across my mouth. For five days this cruel treatment continued. They hardly gave me any food. This afternoon a good meal was brought in to me, but it must have contained opium. The journey to the station was like a dream. But my energy came back at the station and I managed to break away, with the help of that kind gardener.'

About six months later Lord Montalva and Mr Rulli, his secretary, were murdered in their rooms at the Hotel Escorial in Madrid. The murderers were never caught. Mr Baynes came to see us in Baker Street, and showed us the newspaper report. The descriptions of the two men showed clearly who they really were. Justice had come at last to Murillo and Lopez.

'It hasn't been a very neat case, Watson,' said Holmes later. 'But everything seems clear now, doesn't it?'

'I still don't understand why that cook returned to Wisteria House,' I said.

'There are some strange religions in the State of San Pedro, Watson. Perhaps you have heard of one called Voodooism?*' Look in this book here.'

I turned to a page that was already marked, and read:

In Voodooism certain animals must be killed to please the gods. The usual animals are a white bird, which is torn to pieces while it is still alive, and a black goat, whose throat is cut and whose body is burned.

I looked up. 'But what about the leathery black baby that we found?' I asked.

'Oh, that was only one of the cook's gods,' replied Holmes. 'Nothing out of the ordinary.'

*Voodooism: religious beliefs and practices, West African in origin, found mainly in Haiti, and characterized by magical practices involving dead animals.

ACTIVITIES

The Man with the Twisted Lip

Before you read

- 1 Discuss these questions:
 - a What famous detectives do you know? Are they real or fictional?
 - b Why do some people go to private detectives with their problems instead of to the police?
- 2 Look at the Word List at the back of the book. Which are words for:
 - a people?
 - b things that can be dangerous?
 - c things that are commonly found in a field?

While you read

- 3 Circle the correct answer.
 - a Dr Watson looks for an old school friend / a patient at the Bar of Gold.
 - b Sherlock Holmes's enemy owns the Bar of Gold / a large house in Kent.
 - c Mrs Saint Clair's husband is a popular man / an opium addict.
 - d Mrs Saint Clair went to London on business / to see her husband.
 - e The police believe / do not believe Mrs Saint Clair's story.
 - f Holmes thinks that Neville Saint Clair is alive / dead.
 - g A beggar / sailor is a possible suspect for Neville Saint Clair's murder.
 - h At the police station, Hugh Boone refuses to speak / wash properly.
 - i Neville Saint Clair became a beggar because he lost his job / needed to earn more money.
 - j Neville Saint Clair will have to find another job / go to prison.

After you read

- 4 How are these important in the story?
- | | |
|----------|---------------|
| a money | d toys |
| b blood | e a ring |
| c acting | f a wet cloth |
- 5 Work with another student. Was Neville Saint Clair right not to tell his wife about his new job? Have this imaginary conversation between them, before the start of the story.
- Student A:* You are Neville. You want to give up your job as a newspaper reporter and become a beggar. Tell your wife why.
- Student B:* You are Neville's wife. You do not want your husband to work as a beggar. Tell him why.

The Engineer's Thumb

Before you read

- 6 Discuss these questions with another student.
- a How might an engineer lose his thumb?
- b Which would you least like to lose – your thumb or your big toe? Why?

While you read

- 7 When does Hatherley do these things? Number them 1–10.
- | | |
|--|-------|
| a He wakes up by a roadside. | |
| b He meets Captain Stark. | |
| c He travels in a carriage with windows of coloured glass. | |
| d He examines a machine. | |
| e He hears about Fuller's earth. | |
| f He loses his thumb. | |
| g He ignores a woman's advice. | |
| h He travels to Eyford with Holmes and Watson. | |
| i He sees a burning house. | |
| j He meets Mr Ferguson. | |

After you read

- 8 Who is talking, to whom? What are they talking about?
- a 'This has been done by a very sharp, heavy instrument.'
- b 'I do not see what connection these things have with my professional ability.'
- c 'In this way we would earn enough money to buy the neighbouring fields.'
- d 'Do not say a word about it to anybody!'
- e 'Was it tired-looking, or fresh?'
- f 'There is no good here for you to do.'
- g 'I saw that it was coated with another sort of metal, in a fine powder.'
- h 'I attempted to tie a piece of cloth round it.'
- i 'I don't agree with any of them.'
- j 'He's the fattest man in the village.'
- 9 Work with another student. Have this conversation.
- Student A:* You are Stark. You think that the failure of the plan is Elise's fault. Say why.
- Student B:* You are Elise. You think that the failure of the plan is Stark's fault. Say why.
- 10 Discuss these questions with another student.
- a Do you feel sorry for Hatherley? Why (not)?
- b What mistakes did the forgers make?
- c If you were a judge, how would you punish the forgers? Why?

The Patient

Before you read

- 11 One of the characters in this story seems to have catalepsy. (Check the meaning of catalepsy in the Word List at the back of the book.) Catalepsy sometimes lasts for only a few minutes. Then the patient 'wakes up' and can move normally. What problems do you imagine that people with catalepsy have in daily life? Is there anything that they should never do? Why?

While you read

12 Are these statements about Blessington true (✓) or false (X)?

- a He is richer than Dr Trevelyan.
- b He never leaves his room.
- c He seems to have catalepsy.
- d He is upset because Dr Trevelyan goes into his room.
- e He suggests visiting Sherlock Holmes.
- f He does not trust banks.
- g Holmes does not believe him.
- h He keeps a rope under his bed.
- i Blessington is his real name.
- j He knew his murderers.

After you read

13 Answer these questions.

Where:

- a does Blessington keep his money?
- b does Blessington's money really come from?

How:

- c does Blessington die?
- d does Holmes know that Blessington has not killed himself?

Why:

- e is Trevelyan's name known to Watson?
- f does Dr Trevelyan accept Blessington's money?
- g is Blessington murdered?
- h is Blessington not killed immediately?

Who:

- i opens the door for Blessington's killers?
- j is Sutton?

14 Discuss these statements. Do you agree with them? Why (not)?

Blessington would not have died if:

- a Dr Trevelyan had been more observant.
- b Blessington had told Sherlock Holmes the truth.
- c he had kept his money in a bank.
- d there had not been a rope under his bed.

The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax

Before you read

15 Make a list of reasons why a woman might disappear

- a by choice.
- b against her will.

While you read

16 Who or what are these sentences about?

- a Lady Frances carries them with her everywhere.
- b She is given fifty pounds.
- c Lady Frances is proud to meet him.
- d This does not amuse Dr Watson.
- e Dr Watson fights him in the street.
- f He is an Australian criminal.
- g It is delivered to a house in Brixton.
- h It has been arranged for eight o'clock in the morning.
- i He lies to Sherlock Holmes.
- j Lady Frances is discovered inside this.

After you read

17 How are these places important in the story?

- | | |
|---------------|-------------------------|
| a Lausanne | d an Adelaide hotel |
| b Baden-Baden | e 36 Poultney Square |
| c Montpellier | f a hospital in Brixton |

18 How are these people important in the story?

- | | |
|--------------------|---------------------------------|
| a Miss Dobney | f Henry Peters |
| b Marie Devine | g a pawnbroker |
| c Dr Schlessinger | h Mr Stimson of Kennington Road |
| d a French workman | i Rose Spender |
| e Philip Green | |

- 19 Work with another student. Have this conversation, at the end of the story.

Student A: You are Philip Green. You want to marry Lady Frances. Tell her why.

Student B: You are Lady Frances. You are worried about Philip Green's past and do not want to marry him. Tell him why.

The Three Garridebs

Before you read

- 20 This story is about a very unusual family name, Garrideb. More common English family names often come, originally, from:

- the name of the father (for example, Johnson = son of John)
- the name of a job (for example, Thomas Cook, Harry Potter)
- a geographical feature (for example, George Bush, Wayne Bridge)
- physical description, including hair or eye colour (for example, John Brown, Hilary Black)

Think of three more common English family names for each group. Do family names in your country also fit into these groups?

While you read

- 21 Write the missing word(s) in each sentence.

- a Garrideb wants Sherlock Holmes's help.
- b John Garrideb will become if he finds two more male Garridebs.
- c Holmes thinks that John Garrideb is an imaginative but criminal.
- d John Garrideb is when Nathan contacts Sherlock Holmes.
- e John Garrideb wants Nathan to go to
- f John Garrideb is not a lawyer but a
- g The man who lived in the Nathan Garrideb's rooms before him was a famous in Chicago.

- h There is a under the floor boards in Nathan's room.

- i Nathan Garrideb goes at the end of the story.

After you read

- 22 How do these help Sherlock Holmes?

- a Dr Lysander Starr
- b American spelling
- c Holloway and Steele
- d Scotland Yard records

- 23 Discuss these questions with another student.

- a Why does John Garrideb invent the story about the 'Three Garridebs'?
- b How does Nathan feel when he returns from Birmingham? Why?
- c How many words do you know that are spelt differently in British and American English? Continue this list.

British English

colour theatre

American English

color theater

Wisteria House

Before you read

- 24 You have now read a number of Sherlock Holmes stories, so how much can you guess about the next one? Think about:

- a Dr Watson's part in the story
- b other characters
- c the stages in the story
- d the ending

While you read

- 25 Underline the mistakes in these sentences and write the correct words in the spaces.

- a According to Sherlock Holmes, men usually prefer to visit him than to send telegrams.
- b Scott Eccles is invited to spend a few days at a house two miles away from Kensington.
- c During dinner with Scott Eccles, Garcia is very talkative.

- d The police find a letter written by a Spanish woman and addressed to Garcia in the fireplace.
- e The policeman at Wisteria House saw a horrible face in a dream.
- f Holmes finds a strange, monkey-like thing, a dead animal and a bucket of blood in the kitchen at Wisteria House.
- g The police catch Garcia's gardener in the grounds of Wisteria House.
- h Miss Burnet is trying to kill Garcia.
- i Henderson used to be a powerful Central American businessman.
- j Garcia is killed for trying to rob Henderson.

After you read

- 26 How are these people important in the story?
- | | |
|----------------|------------------|
| a Scott Eccles | d Victor Durando |
| b John Warner | e Lopez |
| c Juan Murillo | f Lord Montalva |
- 27 Discuss these questions.
- a Why does Garcia invite Scott Eccles to his house?
 - b Why do the police take away Garcia's cook?
 - c Why is there a dead bird in the kitchen at Wisteria House?

Writing

- 28 ('The Man with the Twisted Lip') You are Neville Saint Clair. Write a letter to the newspaper that you used to work for, asking for your old job back. Explain honestly why you left them and why your experiences have made you a better journalist.
- 29 ('The Man with the Twisted Lip') You are Mrs Saint Clair. Write a letter to Sherlock Holmes, thanking him for his help in solving the mystery. How has your life changed since your husband stopped begging?

- 30 ('The Engineer's Thumb') What happens to 'the beautiful woman, the cruel German and the bad-tempered Englishman' after the fire? Write their story.
- 31 ('The Engineer's Thumb') Hatherley cannot remember anything from the time he fainted until he woke up by the side of the road. Describe what happened to him.
- 32 ('The Patient') You are a journalist. You think that if Holmes and Dr Trevelyan had acted differently, Blessington would not have died. Explain why in a report for your newspaper.
- 33 ('The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax') You are Lady Frances. Write a letter to Marie Devine, persuading her to work for you again. Explain why you treated her so badly.
- 34 ('The Disappearance of Lady Frances Carfax') Write about Philip Green's early life, when he 'made a few mistakes and got into trouble'. Why did Lady Frances refuse to speak to him again?
- 35 ('The Three Garridebs') You are John Garrideb's lawyer at his trial. You think that he should not be punished because he has not done anything really wrong. Write your speech to the jury.
- 36 ('Wisteria House') Describe how Mrs Victor Durando finally got revenge on Murillo and Lopez in Madrid.
- 37 Which of these stories do you like best? Why? Write about it for your school or college magazine.

Answers for the Activities in this book are available from the Penguin Readers website. A free Activity Worksheet is also available from the website. Activity Worksheets are part of the Penguin Teacher Support Programme, which also includes Progress Tests and Graded Reader Guidelines. For more information, please visit: www.penguinreaders.com.

WORD LIST

addict (n) someone who is unable to stop taking drugs appliance (n) a piece of equipment axe (n) a tool with a wooden handle and a metal blade, used for cutting wood brandy (n) a strong alcoholic drink made from wine carriage (n) a vehicle pulled by horses cart (n) a vehicle with two or more wheels that is pulled by a person or a horse catalepsy (n) a condition in which you lose the ability to move your arms and legs chloroform (n) a liquid with a strong smell that makes people unconscious cigar (n) thick rolls of dried tobacco leaves, which people smoke clay (n) a type of heavy earth used for making pots and bricks client (n) someone who pays a person or organization for services or advice coffin (n) the box in which a dead person is buried consult (v) to ask someone for advice or information cripple (n) a word (now offensive) for someone who cannot walk properly determined (adj) wanting to do something very much, so you will not let anyone or anything stop you forge (v) to illegally copy something to make people think it is real lighthouse (n) a tower with a bright light that warns ships of danger magnifying glass (n) a round piece of glass with a handle, which makes things look bigger when you look through it maid (n) a female servant opium (n) a very strong illegal drug pawnbroker (n) someone who lends money to people in exchange for valuable objects plough (n, plow AmE) a piece of equipment used on farms to turn over the earth before seeds are planted seal (n) a piece of rubber or plastic on a pipe or a machine that stops liquid or air from going in or out of it soil (n) the top layer of the earth, in which plants grow straw (n) the long, thin parts of crops like wheat, dried and used for animal feed or for making things suspicion (n) the feeling that someone has done something wrong or that something may be true telegram (n) a message sent using electrical signals tremble (v) to shake because you are worried, afraid or excited undertaker (n) someone who arranges funerals veil (n) a thin piece of material that women wear to cover their faces; something that it is difficult to see through

Rebecca

Daphne du Maurier

After the death of his beautiful wife, Rebecca, Maxim de Winter goes to Monte Carlo to forget the past. There he marries a quiet young woman and takes her back to Manderley, his lovely country home. But the memory of Rebecca casts a dark shadow on the new marriage. Then the discovery of a sunken boat shatters the new Mrs de Winter's dream of a happy life.

The Talented Mr Ripley

Patricia Highsmith

Tom Ripley goes to Italy. He needs to find Dickie Greenleaf. Dickie's father wants him to go back to America. But Tom likes Italy, and he likes Dickie's money. Tom wants to stay in Italy, and he will do anything to get what he wants. The Talented Mr Ripley is now an exciting movie with Matt Damon, Gwyneth Paltrow and Jude Law.

Ripley's Game

Patricia Highsmith

One night, Tom Ripley is insulted by a man at a party. An ordinary person would just be upset by this, but Tom Ripley is not an ordinary person. Months later, when a friend asks him for help with two simple murders, he remembers this night and plans revenge. He starts a game – a very nasty game, in which he plays with the life of a sick and innocent man. But how far will he go?

There are hundreds of Penguin Readers to choose from – world classics, film adaptations, modern-day crime and adventure, short stories, biographies, American classics, non-fiction, plays ...

For a complete list of all Penguin Readers titles, please contact your local Pearson Longman office or visit our website.

www.penguinreaders.com

A Time to Kill

John Grisham

Ten-year-old Tonya Hailey is attacked and raped by two local men. Carl Lee, Tonya's father, shoots them. Now only his lawyer and friend, Jake Brigance, stands between him and the electric chair. Is there a legal defense for Carl Lee's actions?

The Body

Stephen King

Gordie Lanchance and his three friends are always ready for adventure. When they hear about a dead body in the forest they go to look for it. Then they discover how cruel the world can be. A story by Stephen King – the master of horror.

The Prisoner of Zenda

Anthony Hope

Rudolf Rassendyll, a daring young Englishman looking for adventure, arrives in Ruritania for the new king's coronation. The two men meet by chance the day before and are shocked to find that they look exactly the same! A trick leaves Rudolf in the king's place while the king becomes the Prisoner of Zenda.

There are hundreds of Penguin Readers to choose from – world classics, film adaptations, modern-day crime and adventure, short stories, biographies, American classics, non-fiction, plays ...

For a complete list of all Penguin Readers titles, please contact your local Pearson Longman office or visit our website.

www.penguinreaders.com

Taste and Other Tales

Roald Dahl

In this collection of Roald Dahl's finest stories we meet some quite ordinary people who behave in extraordinary ways. There is a man who is sure he can hear plants scream and the wife who discovers a perfect way to get rid of her husband. And there's a woman who finds an unusual use for a leg of lamb...

Four Weddings and a Funeral

Richard Curtis

It's a Saturday morning, and Charles is still asleep. He should be on his way to Angus and Laura's wedding! Charles is always late, and he is always going to other people's weddings. He's worried that he will never find the right woman to marry. Then he meets Carrie and he wants to be with her very much...

The Firm

John Grisham

Mitch McDeere is young, intelligent and ambitious. When he gets a job with the law firm of Bendini, Lambert & Locke it seems to be the path to money and power. But soon Mitch finds that the firm is listening to all his phone calls, and the FBI want to speak to him. Money and power has a price – and it could be Mitch's life.

There are hundreds of Penguin Readers to choose from – world classics, film adaptations, modern-day crime and adventure, short stories, biographies, American classics, non-fiction, plays ...

For a complete list of all Penguin Readers titles, please contact your local Pearson Longman office or visit our website.

www.penguinreaders.com

The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde

Robert Louis Stevenson

Dr Jekyll is a London doctor who is liked and respected for his work. Mr Hyde is an evil man, completely unknown in London society. There is a murder and Hyde seems to be responsible. So why does the good doctor give Mr Hyde the key to his house – and decide to leave everything to Mr Hyde in his will?

The War of the Worlds

H. G. Wells

The War of the Worlds is one of the most frightening science fiction novels ever written. When a spaceship falls from the sky and lands in southern England, few people are worried. But when strange creatures climb out and start killing, nobody is safe.

Tales of Mystery and Imagination

Edgar Allan Poe

Edgar Allan Poe, 'the father of the detective story' and a master of horror, is one of the greatest American short story writers. In these stories we meet people struggling with fear, revenge, mental illness and death. Which of them will win – and which will lose – their battles?

There are hundreds of Penguin Readers to choose from – world classics, film adaptations, modern-day crime and adventure, short stories, biographies, American classics, non-fiction, plays ...

For a complete list of all Penguin Readers titles, please contact your local Pearson Longman office or visit our website.

www.penguinreaders.com

Longman Dictionaries

Express yourself with confidence!

*Longman has led the way in ELT dictionaries since 1935.
We constantly talk to students and teachers around the world to find out what they need from a learner's dictionary.*

Why choose a Longman dictionary?

Easy to understand

Longman invented the Defining Vocabulary – 2000 of the most common words which are used to write the definitions in our dictionaries. So Longman definitions are always clear and easy to understand.

Real, natural English

All Longman dictionaries contain natural examples taken from real-life that help explain the meaning of a word and show you how to use it in context.

Avoid common mistakes

Longman dictionaries are written specially for learners, and we make sure that you get all the help you need to avoid common mistakes. We analyse typical learners' mistakes and include notes on how to avoid them.

Innovative CD-ROMs

Longman are leaders in dictionary CD-ROM innovation. Did you know that a dictionary CD-ROM includes features to help improve your pronunciation, help you practice for exams and improve your writing skills?

For details of all Longman dictionaries, and to choose the one that's right for you, visit our website:

www.longman.com/dictionaries

Sherlock Holmes Short Stories

In these six stories we join the brilliant detective, Sherlock Holmes, and his friend Dr Watson, in a variety of exciting adventures. These include several suspicious deaths, the mystery of the engineer with the missing thumb, and the strange case of the two men who share a very unusual name.

Penguin Readers are simplified texts which provide a step-by-step approach to the joys of reading for pleasure.

Series Editors: Andy Hopkins and Jocelyn Potter

Easystarts	200 headwords
Level 1	300 headwords	Beginner
Level 2	600 headwords	Elementary
Level 3	1200 headwords	Pre-Intermediate
Level 4	1700 headwords	Intermediate
Level 5	2300 headwords	Upper-Intermediate
Level 6	3000 headwords	Advanced

Classic

British English

Number of words (excluding activities): 35,476

Cover illustration by © Nick Hardcastle / www.nickhardcastle.co.uk

Audio CD pack also available

www.penguinreaders.com

LEVEL 5

PEARSON
Longman

ISBN 978-1-4058-6523-4

9 781405 865234 >